I also wish to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. RALSTON] are attending a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I also announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are attending a meeting of a special investigating committee of the Senate.

I also announce that the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] are attending a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The clerk will call the roll of absentees.

The principal clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

Bursum	Neely	Pittman	Watson
McKellar

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After some delay, the following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edge	Reed, Mo.	Walsh, Mass.
Ball	Ernst	Shipstead
Broussard	Harreld	Swanson

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I inquire how many Senators have responded to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to compel the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to compel the presence of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms is directed to compel the presence of absent Senators.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

McLean and Johnson of Minnesota.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 37 minutes a. m.) the Senate adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, May 14, 1924

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we turn our thoughts to Thee. Thou knowest us better than any others can possibly know us. We seek from Thee guidance in the many duties which come. Enable us to see Thy face continually, and may we be glad to do Thy will, fulfilling every purpose of Thy grace in connection with responsibilities which are so arduous. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, May 13, 1924, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is absent owing to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 3933) for the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal property, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. ROBINSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Reyburn and vicinity and Hot Springs County, Ark., remonstrating against any increases in the rates in the parcel-post service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution of the District Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Coats, Kans., protesting against amendment of the national prohibition act, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of sundry citizens of Sylvan, Wash., praying an appropriation to enable the United States to participate in the forthcoming international conference for the suppression of the narcotic traffic, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Green River, Wyo., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Howell-Barkley railway labor bill, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota presented the petition of Art E. Granlund and 184 other citizens of Mille Lacs County, Minn., praying the imposition of higher tariff duties on butter and butter products so as to protect the home market, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of H. P. Bengtson and 35 other citizens of Yellow Medicine County; of A. V. Hare and 25 other citizens of Pennington County; and of S. A. Syresson and 47 other citizens of Scambler Township, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for the passage of the so-called McNary-Haugen export corporation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Pacific Post No. 290, the American Legion, William Courtney commander, favoring the passage of the so-called Johnson bill for the relief of disabled veterans of the World War, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of A. G. Sanford and 55 other citizens, members of Gopher Local, No. 205, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Dropforgers, and Helpers, of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the passage of the so-called Howell-Barkley railway labor bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Fred Schmidt and 188 other patients of United States Veterans' Hospital No. 68, of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the passage of the so-called Johnson bill for the relief of disabled veterans of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Matt Johnson and H. R. Hicks and 295 other citizens of Grand Marais, Cook County, Minn., remonstrating aginst the passage of the so-called Fuller bill, providing for the enlargement of the Superior National Forest, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of citizens held at Grand Marais, Cook County, Minn., protesting against the passage of the so-called Fuller bill, providing for the enlargement of the Superior National Forest, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. KENDRICK, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 976) for the relief of Lyn Lundquist, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 534) thereon.

Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6482) authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for mail messenger service, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 535) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1005) to make valid and enforceable written provisions or agreements for arbitration of disputes arising out of contracts, maritime transactions, or commerce among the States or Territories or with foreign nations, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 536) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH:

A bill (S. 3305) to renew and extend certain letters patent; to the Committee on Patents.

A bill (S. 3306) to amend section 21 of the act entitled "An act making apropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes," approved May 28, 1896, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 3307) for the relief of E. L. F. Auffurth and others; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 3308) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Helm; to the Committee on Pensions.

GASPARILLA ISLAND MILITARY RESERVATION, FLA.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3276) authorizing the sale of real property no longer required for military purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO RIVERS AND HARBORS BILL

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment providing for the examination and survey of an extension of the intracoastal canal system from New Orleans, La., to Apalachicola River, Fla., and deepening and maintaining a channel up the Apalachicola and Chattahoochee Rivers to Columbus, Ga., of sufficient depth to permit economical operation of self-propelled barges, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8914, the rivers and harbors authorization bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment providing that additional taxes amounting to $74,657.70, together with all penalties and other charges thereon, assessed by the Treasury Department against the estate of Charles L. Freer, deceased, late of Detroit, Mich., which estate has been closed, the executors discharged, and the residue paid over to the Smithsonian Institution as an endowment for the Freer Gallery of Art, presented to the Nation by the said Charles L. Freer, be canceled and the Treasury Department be authorized and directed to remit any further taxes, penalties, or charges which may hereafter be found due from the said estate, intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF FEDERAL FARM LOAN SYSTEM

Mr. HOWELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 223), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate pro tempore is authorized to appoint a special committee of three members, which shall investigate the Federal farm loan system and the Federal Farm Loan Board and report its findings, together with recommendations for corrective legislation. The committee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit during the sessions and recesses of the Sixty-eighth Congress, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not to exceed 25 cents per hundred words. The committee is further authorized to send for persons and papers; to require by subpœna the attendance of witnesses, the production of books and documents; to administer oaths; and to take testimony.

The expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

TERMS OF DISTRICT COURT IN WYOMING

Mr. WARREN. The Senate last night passed the bill (H. R. 4445) to amend section 115 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary." It appears that there is an error in it which should be corrected. I therefore enter a motion to reconsider the vote on its passage, and move that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 3933) for the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal property, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRESIDENTAL APPROVALS

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed acts and a joint resolution of the following titles:

On May 9, 1924:

S. 2902. An act authorizing the acquiring of Indian lands on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, in Idaho, for reservoir purposes in connection with the Minidoka irrigration project.

On May 13, 1924:

S. 2392. An act authorizing an appropriation to indemnify damages caused by the search for the body of Admiral John Paul Jones;

S. 2908. An act providing for a study regarding the equitable use of the waters of the Rio Grande below Fort Quitman, Tex., in cooperation with the United States of Mexico; and

S. J. Res. 104. Joint resolution requesting the President to invite the Interparliamentary Union to meet in Washington City in 1925, and authorizing an appropriation to defray the expenses of the meeting.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7877, the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I assume that if the Senator from New York would ask unanimous consent to proceed at once to the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill, there would probably be no objection to his request. Pending his request, if he chooses to make it, however, I desire to submit a brief statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will withdraw my motion, and request unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7877, the War Department appropriation bill.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senate recessed yesterday afternoon until 11 o'clock this morning. When the Senate met, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] suggested the absence of a quorum and a quorum failed to respond. It then became necessary to move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. After that motion had prevailed and the Sergeant at Arms had been busy for half an hour, a motion was made to direct the Sergeant at Arms to compel the attendance of absent Senators. At 20 minutes of 12 o'clock I made a motion that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock, and that motion prevailed.

I made the motion in order to emphasize the absurdity, when a large majority of the Senators are busy attending committees, of undertaking to hold a session of the Senate at other than the regular hour when the Senate is expected to meet.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to state that if the Sergeant at Arms had called the Committee on Finance he would have found there were three Senators in attendance upon that committee who would have come to the Chamber immediately to make up the quorum. The committee room was not called. I had announced the absence of four Senators who were attending the meeting of the Finance Committee. One of those Senators came into the Chamber and answered to his name, and the other three would have come if they had been notified that their presence was required.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to continue my statement for just a moment. I want to finish it.

It is an absurd practice to undertake to have all the Senate committees in session and to have the Senate itself trying to do business at the same time. If it is necessary for committees to meet in the morning, I suggest that the Senate should meet at the regular hour. We have arranged for a night session tomorrow night, and we have been holding night sessions for some time. Why is it thought desirable to arrange for a recess until 11 o'clock, to request Senators to meet here at that hour, and then consume the time until 12 o'clock securing the attendance of a quorum? It wastes an hour's time of 96 Senators. It is an absurd practice. The Senate ought to meet at 12 o'clock, or the Senate committees ought not to be in session if the Senate meets earlier than 12 o'clock. The truth of the matter is that the time of the Senate would be conserved if we arranged for the business of committees to be conducted on certain days and for the Senate to meet on other days when the committees were not in session. I suggest to the majority that hereafter, if they arrange for meetings of the Senate earlier than 12 o'clock, they discontinue their committee meetings, so the Senate may transact business.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say just a word on the subject touched upon by the Senator from Arkansas. I have just come into the Chamber from a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have had under consideration since the reconvening of Congress the question of Muscle Shoals. We have had, of course, extensive hearings on various bills pertaining to other questions related to agriculture and have spent a great deal of time on them.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I venture to say without fear of successful contradiction, when their hearings are finished will present to the country and to the world the greatest amount of useful evidence and testimony on the question of water power that has ever been gotten together anywhere since the dawn of civilization.

I make this assertion, and I want any member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to dispute it right now if he does not agree with me, that there have never been hearings on the subject of water power or any other subject where the testimony on the average has been more closely confined to the subject at issue and upon which the committee is called to pass. There has never been an instance where the testimony has been more illuminating and more to the point. We find a great clamor on the part principally of those who favor the acceptance of Mr. Ford's offer, and I say this without any criticism, because I agree with them that the question ought to be settled. They claim that the committee should report and that the Senate ought to act; and yet in all the testimony which has been produced before the committee there have been but two witnesses who have for five minutes of the time diverted and brought in a lot of irrelevant testimony, and both of those witnesses were in favor of the acceptance of Mr. Ford's offer.

The testimony has been educational. It has been enlightening. It is a subject, when gone into in any detail, that is almost like fiction. The possibilities of what can be done at Muscle Shoals, which is one of the key points to the whole country, and particularly to the South, are almost beyond human imagination. Personally I have no interest in it and neither have my people except as citizens of our common country. We are not through. We have been in session every day until 12 o'clock, and while there is a demand, which I think is justified to some extent, that we report before this session draws to a close, I wish to say that we can not do it if we are going to be compelled to close those hearings and to come to the Senate at 11 o'clock. That will be out of the question; it will be a physical impossibility. I think we are doing more good and will be able to do more good for the country at large and for the South in particular by going on and exhausting the subject and hearing everybody who has anything of value to say on every bill which has been presented, including my own bill, which provides that the Government shall retain all the property and through a governmental corporation administer it as well.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am glad to hear, as I understand the Senator, that the hearings will be concluded and a report will be made by the committee during the present session; at least, it is the opinion of the Senator at this time that that can be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; that is what we are all trying to do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope the report will be made in time for action at the present session of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope so.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I am very much interested in this project. I am anxious, and I have been anxious for many years, for the completed development of the Muscle Shoals, and by a general water-power bill. Soon after I came to the Senate in 1914 or 1915, I made an effort to accomplish that purpose, but the measure was killed in the other House, I believe, after the Senate had twice passed it. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if he can advise me how much has the Government spent in the construction of the dams at Muscle Shoals?

Mr. NORRIS. The Government has spent somewhere in the neighborhood of between $130,000,000 and $150,000,000 on the project.

Mr. SHIELDS. That amount has already been expended?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; not in the dams alone, however, but also in the other properties that the Government owns there.

Mr. SHIELDS. Such as the construction of the nitrate plant and the steam plant?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. What is the estimate of the amount it will take to complete the work?

Mr. NORRIS. It is estimated that Dam No. 2, which is now about three-fourths completed, will cost from $49,000,000 to $51,000,000, and that Dam No. 3 will cost from $25,000,000 to $27,000,000.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is it estimated that it will cost that much in addition to what has already been spent?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I mean that will be the total cost.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought I misunderstood the Senator. How much will be required to complete Dam No. 2?

Mr. NORRIS. Speaking generally, in round numbers, about one-fourth of $50,000,000.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, it will require from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. And already about $130,000,000 or $135,000,000 has been expended there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator from Nebraska find any disposition or feeling in Congress, in either House, or is there any disposition in the country to suspend that work and leave it uncompleted in its present condition, regardless of whom it may be leased to?

Mr. NORRIS. There has been some propaganda to that effect, but, in my judgment, it is absolutely, completely, and totally unfounded. I would not think of such a thing as consenting to abandoning that property now. There might have been a question at the beginning whether or not we should enter upon the work, but we have entered upon it; we have spent the people's money in its prosecution; and there is only one thing to do, and that is to complete it, whatever disposition may afterwards be made of the property.

Mr. SHIELDS. In about what time is it likely to be completed, in view of the progress which is now being made?

Mr. NORRIS. It is expected that Dam No. 2 will be completed in a year from the next coming July, and that it will take from three to five years to complete Dam No. 3.

Mr. SHIELDS. The completion of Dam No. 2 will enable the lessee, whoever he may be, to begin the manufacture of nitrates and other fertilizers and otherwise to utilize the power?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. I did not intend to speak of this matter, but since the Senator has asked about it and since he so creditably, in part, represents the great State of Tennessee in this body, I wish to say that this very day I had my attention called to what I was told was propaganda being circulated that we were likely to quit; that those who are opposed to the Ford offer wanted to quit; that the development of the Tennessee River by dams that ought to be built, as well as these two, would never be undertaken; and that the improvement of the navigation of the Tennessee River would not be undertaken. I want to state to the Senator that there is not any foundation of truth whatever for that kind of propaganda or statement, I do not care who makes it.

The Ford proposition, for instance, as well as the propositions of all the other bidders, does not contemplate the building of a single storage dam outside of Dams No. 1 and No. 2. Such a proposition is not contained in any bill.

The bill which the committee has before it, and which, in my judgment, has behind it a majority of the committee, provides for the survey and development of the Tennessee River, completely, from source to mouth, as to flood-water control, as to navigation, and as to power development.

I only rose to say, Mr. President, that while, of course, I know that this question has two sides, if the Senate wants to meet at 10 o'clock or 11 o'clock in the morning, and to require the attendance of Senators, we shall, of course, have to obey; but, if we do, we shall have to suspend operations in the committee; and I think it would be almost a crime to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the military appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection to the request of the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, might we not have the bill laid before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from New York, and it is so ordered.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we are falling behind in the matter of passing the appropriation bills. I hope that the appropriation bill now before the Senate will not be delayed beyond the early portion of to-day, but I think hereafter we shall have to meet evenings and possibly this evening, particularly in view of what my friend, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has said. As it seems to be inconvenient to meet earlier in the morning, probably we shall have to resort to evening sessions in order to expedite the consideration of the appropriation bills. We ought to be here at 11 o'clock promptly; the business of the Senate makes a meeting at that hour necessary.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in response to the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] regarding the hearings that are now proceeding before the Committee on Agriculture I wish to say that these hearings have been going on for weeks, and some very interesting facts have been brought out. Much of the testimony, however, has covered practically the same ground. While suggestions are being made by some of the witnesses, probably, that other witnesses have not made, yet, in the main we have reached that point where, in my judgment, the hearings should be speedily brought to a close.

It has been more than two and a half years since Mr. Ford was invited to make a bid for Muscle Shoals. The Muscle Shoals project had been abandoned; the cofferdams were washing away; the House committee that went down to inspect and investigate the project reported that it ought to be abandoned as junk. Then Mr. Ford, in company with Mr. Edison, went down to see Muscle Shoals, came back, and in response to the invitation of the Government made an offer. For months and months his was the only offer pending; but as soon as the combined power companies discovered that Henry Ford might get Muscle Shoals and they be defeated in their purpose of getting it ultimately they commenced to make bids. That there is a combination between some if not all of these companies to prevent Henry Ford from acquiring Muscle Shoals I have not the slightest doubt. I believe that almost anyone who attended the hearings day by day would be convinced that there is concert of action between some of those representing the various companies, all working together for the good of each other and all against Henry Ford.

Henry Ford is entitled to know whether or not his bid is going to be accepted. Two and a half years have come and gone since the Government invited him to bid. The House, I believe, has twice passed a bill accepting his offer. The Senate has had the bill for quite a while, and it is now before the committee and has been there several weeks.

I say again, Mr. President, I want to see the hearings speedily brought to a close. I do not want to do anybody an injustice; I want everybody to be heard whom it is necessary or desirable to hear; but two and a half years is a long time to consider a matter like this, and two and a half years is a long time to keep in suspense a man who has made a bid, as Mr. Ford has. I submit to the Senate and to the country that, whether his bid is going to be accepted or not, he is entitled to have the Senate determine the question; and I want to appeal to the Senator from Nebraska, who is very much interested in this power question and always has been, although he favors one view of the question and I favor another, in a spirit of justice to Mr. Ford to expedite consideration by the committee so that we may have some kind of action by the Senate before we adjourn and so that Mr. Ford may know whether he is going to get Muscle Shoals or whether he is not going to get Muscle Shoals. He is entitled to know that.

If the Senate does not want him to have Muscle Shoals, it ought to say so by its vote. So I hope that the Senator from Nebraska will help us to expedite matters and hold witnesses to the issue directly involved and speed up the hearings as much as possible, and let us get through this week, if possible, and act on these measures and bring out all of them—I would not object to that—and let the Senate itself say which one of them it will accept.

So far as I am individually concerned, representing the sentiment of the people of Alabama, as I believe I do, who are overwhelmingly in favor of the Ford offer, as is the whole South, I may say I should regret to see an adjournment until a vote has been had upon this question.

I shall vigorously oppose anything looking toward adjournment until the Senate has an opportunity to vote on the Ford offer.

Mr. GOODING and Mr. REED of Missouri addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GOODING obtained the floor.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. GOODING. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Had the Senator been addressing the Senate in a speech that is not yet concluded?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; but I will yield to the Senator on this subject.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Under those circumstances I do not want to interfere with the Senator. I wanted to discuss the Pittman amendment.

Mr. GOODING. That is before the Senate and I shall be very glad to have the Senator discuss it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, with the permission of both Senators, I should like to say just a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say just a few words in reference to what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has said. If the Senators are not going to discuss that subject, will they be kind enough to let me do that?

Mr. GOODING. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say, too, that after the Senator has discussed the matter I desire to say merely a word about the proposition now pending—not the long-and-short-haul proposition?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is so often asserted that Muscle Shoals was abandoned; and yet when we get down to the whole truth of the matter we find, as the Senator from Alabama says, that a committee of the House recommended its abandonment. On the other hand, the Senate passed a bill providing for the continuation of the work under way there and the completion of the plant. So it is not correct to say that Muscle Shoals has been abandoned. I know that neither the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry nor other Members of the Senate outside of the committee ever for one moment conceded that it was abandoned, notwithstanding the action taken by the House committee.

I join with anybody in wanting to get this matter settled just as soon as possible. I want it settled, if possible, at this session of Congress; but let me ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], both of whom favor the Ford proposition, whether they can call to mind a single instance, with the exception of the two I have mentioned, where time has been wasted? I am not even criticizing those, because those things creep in; but Major Stalman, a Ford advocate, and the man who followed him, a Ford advocate, devoted most of their time to issues that had nothing to do with Muscle Shoals. Outside of that, I want to ask these Senators if there has been any time wasted?

I know that as chairman of the committee I have received applications from all kinds of people who wanted to be heard, and when I found out that they wanted to talk about something else, or that they had a side issue that they wanted to air, I did not call them. I want to permit everybody, including Mr. Ford, to have all the time he wants to explain his proposition, as long as he sticks to the text.

The Senator has said that, in his judgment, there is a combination of other bidders. Of course I can not say as to that. I can only say that not a scintilla of evidence has been produced before the committee that there is, either directly or indirectly, any such combination. The Senator from Alabama is on the committee. He has an opportunity to bring it out if there is such a thing. I should be glad to have it done. I do not believe there is. As far as my idea of the disposition of Muscle Shoals is concerned, I do not care whether there is a combination or not; I do not want them to have it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understood the Senator a few moments ago, he said that he thought a report would be made by June 1. Do I understand the Senator to say, also, that he is in favor of a vote on the question at this session?

Mr. NORRIS. Why, of course I am in favor of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it ought to be passed on, and I hope there will be a vote at this session.

Mr. NORRIS. There is one thing, Mr. President, that has been just a little exasperating. Senators say, "Do you want to get a vote at this session?" and I say "Yes"; and the question comes over and over, "Are you going to report as soon as possible?" and I say, "Yes; I am doing everything I can to expedite it"; but the very questioning sometimes appears to me to be an intimation that I am not trying to do that.

If there is anybody on the committee or off of it who has any such information, let him produce it. The committee ought to know about it. I have done the best I could to be absolutely fair, whether the witness agreed with me or not; and, personally, I do not agree with very many of the witnesses as to what ought to be done with Muscle Shoals. That, however, does not preclude me, I think, from giving them a full and fair hearing.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I wish to discuss the Pittman amendment briefly; but since this other question is before the Senate—a question on which I intend to address the Senate later—I shall simply say this:

The disposition to surrender to any one citizen, however good he may be, however wise he may be, however public-spirited he may be, a great public work in which the Federal Government has invested many millions of dollars and to make that surrender upon the theory that this particular individual is in some way a general guardian of the public and the private interests of the people of the United States is, in my opinion, the limit of absurdity. Mr. Ford should be dealt with exactly as any other citizen of the United States. His contract should be shown to be a contract beneficial to the people of the United States and the most beneficial that can be offered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there? I should like to call his attention to the fact that Mr. Ford is the only bidder of all the bidders who has refused to come before the committee in person and explain his bid.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well. That does not alter the situation. He should be dealt with on business principles, no matter how good he may be—and he is so good that he can be nominated by the Democratic Party and please it, and then indorse a Republican President the next day and please him. He can do other strange and peculiar things, and, to use a slang phrase, "get away with it." Nevertheless, we must deal on business principles, for, even if he were as good as some people think he is, he is not going to live forever, and the contract we propose to make and which will run for more than a hundred years will have to be carried out by somebody other than Mr. Ford.

There is a disposition to say, "Give it to Henry Ford, and he will do the business." Against that sort of theory I most earnestly protest in the name of common sense. Besides, sir, I do not believe that any man who, when he gets into a financial pinch, will unload upon his agents against their will millions of dollars' worth of his products and compel them to go to the banks and raise money to advance on automobiles and tractors they never ordered, and who, having unloaded these articles upon the agents and compelled them to go to the banks and borrow the money and advance it to him, then refuses to protect them on the price of the article he compelled them to take but cuts the price, is such an archangel of purity and disinterestedness as some other people would have us think.

When this Government comes to deal with Henry Ford it had better deal with him as a shrewd, keen business man and protect itself. I do not say that to speak with harshness of Mr. Ford; but I have been looking around during my lifetime for one of these infallible and absolutely disinterested creatures, and I am still in the same condition of doubt that poor, old Diogenes was when he started out with his lantern. My quest is equally with his a failure.

I have no hesitancy in saying that with the amount of money the Government has put into this great public work the Government ought to complete it; and while I do not believe in the Government being in business at all, I believe it ought to hold it. Then I believe it ought to make an arrangement to wholesale the power under such conditions as will bring to the people of this country the benefits that all of us would like to see realized. That kind of operation will not put the Government in business in the offensive sense in which the term is usually employed.

We have had a good deal of trouble with Muscle Shoals. We have put a lot of money into it, and I want to see that money conserved. I am growing more and more of the opinion as time goes on that the great fundamental resources of this country which are necessary to furnish power to public or quasi-public service institutions to enable them to furnish heat, light, and power to the people of the United States as a whole should be kept as nearly as possible within complete public ownership and control.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do.

Mr. KENDRICK. I want to ask the Senator if he understands that Muscle Shoals as a water power is second only in this country to Niagara Falls?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have heard that statement made, and I have no reason to doubt it at the present time.

Mr. KENDRICK. And does not the Senator believe that to deliver that water power to any individual or corporation other than under the water power act would have the effect of destroying that act? Does not the Senator believe that it would completely, or almost completely, nullify the water power act?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I think it would greatly impair it.

Mr. President, it was disclosed on the floor of the Senate the other day, in the debate on the tax bill, that some great corporations escaped the payment of surtaxes either by themselves or by their stockholders by accumulating enormous reserves, and that among others Mr. Ford had accumulated something like $265,000,000 in cash, and that by holding it and not distributing it the surtaxes of himself and other stockholders were enormously reduced. I do not speak of that to deal harshly with Mr. Ford, but it illustrates the fact that "though on pleasure he is bent, he has a frugal mind." He looks after, or some of his skillful employees look after, his business pretty keenly, and I think that in figuring with the Federal Government he has not been figuring for the benefit of the man who wants fertilizer. His heart has not been bleeding over the poor farmer who wants to make his fields rich, and to do it with cheap material. He has been thinking about the dividends that will flow to Henry Ford, and he has the right to do that; but, upon the other hand, we, dealing for the people of the United States, must look after the interests of the people of the United States.

This twaddle and folderol and froth indulged in over Henry Ford, to use another slang expression, simply makes me tired. If he has ever done anything great for his country, I do not know it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Missouri. If John D. Rockfeller were engaged in the automobile business and were doing exactly what Mr. Ford is doing, the common opinion in this country would be that he was cutting prices to destroy all the other automobile companies of the country to create a great monopoly. Gentlemen would be standing here on their hind legs roaring until the stumps out there in the old Potomac River would bob up and down, as those gentlemen denounced John D. Rockefeller.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I am interested in what the Senator is saying, because I had a letter last week from a constituent appealing to me very pathetically to be sure to vote to give Muscle Shoals to Henry Ford, as Mr. Ford, so my friend says, would "make nitrates for the farmers." I scrutinized the Ford proposition closely, and I find to my surprise that Mr. Ford does not pledge himself and does not agree to make fertilizers. If I am wrong about that, I should like to be set right.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is entirely wrong.

Mr. ASHURST. I am willing to be enlightened. Applying my scrutiny to the Ford proposition, as submitted to me, I find that Mr. Ford does not agree to make fertilizers. As a matter of law, there is nothing in the contract compelling him to make fertilizers.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. My interpretation of the contract is that Mr. Ford agrees to make 40,000 tons of nitrates each year, providing he can make 8 per cent on the production.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is a very modest profit for him to make. Mr. President, I simply threw in those remarks concerning Muscle Shoals because the spirit moved me at this moment to make them.

I want to say a few words to the Senate in regard to the Pittman amendment, the long and short haul amendment. That question has been before the Senate ever since I have been a Member of the Senate, and I say in the inception that there is no question but that the problem of railroad rates is one of the most difficult and intricate with which the human mind has ever undertaken to grapple. There are so many considerations which enter into the question of the making of rates and of permitting the transportation lines to live that none of us can say with absolute certainty that we are able to devise a plan for just and equitable rates in all cases. But this much we certainly know, that every railroad in the United States is a common and public carrier; that there is exercised on behalf of it the powers of eminent domain, whereby it is enabled to take the property of the private citizen for its own use, and that that is justified because it is a public highway, and as it is a public highway it exists for the common benefit of all of the people of the land, always, of course, subject to its just right to fair compensation for services rendered.

Starting with the premise that the railroads are public highways, existing for the common benefit of the public, it follows that any condition or any system of rates so devised as to build up one section of the country at the expense of another section of the country is inequitable, unjust, and utterly indefensible.

Any community of the United States is entitled to the benefits of its natural advantage, and no law is a just law which levies upon that community a tribute for the support, the maintenance, and the emolument of some other portion of the Republic.

Mr. President, when the railroads were practically without governmental supervision they inaugurated a system of meeting competition or, if there was no competition, of building up a particular section of the country, in the hope of thereafter reaping profits from it, and that system embraced frequently the hauling of freight to the favored community for less than the actual cost of the haul. In order to make up the disadvantage for the losses thus sustained an enormously unjust tribute was levied upon other sections of the country which were not so favored by the railroads. So it came about that communities and States and entire sections of the country were, by the arbitrary action of those who managed the public highways of the country, discriminated against, while other sections were specially favored.

That was, of course, an unjustifiable and an iniquitous system, because it placed the destiny of the people in the hands of a few men who controlled the public highways, not for the general public good but for the special good of certain communities, to the end that the transportation lines might reap some special benefit for themselves.

When the Interstate Commerce Commission was created it was expected that those evils and enormities would be abolished, and that a system of transportation rates favorable alike to all sections of the country, justly and fairly arranged, would take the place of the system which had been inaugurated by selfish interests for selfish purposes, but from that day to this we have been struggling with the Interstate Commerce Commission and have found it about as difficult of management as the powers which formerly controlled the railroads, and I have sometimes thought more difficult of management.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was very much interested in what the Senator was saying about building up certain communities. I was wondering if what he had to say in that regard applied to communities situated on natural waterways.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not wish to be diverted from the line of thought I am pursuing at this moment, but I will try to answer the Senator's question a little later.

Under the old system, and under the system as perpetuated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, it frequently happened that goods could be shipped—and I speak of this as only one illustration—from New York or St. Louis or Kansas City or other intermediate points clear to the Pacific coast, through the city of Denver or the city of Salt Lake or others of the western towns or cities, and then shipped back cheaper than they could be shipped to one of these towns and unloaded on the direct passage west.

I do not care how much verbal chicanery or intellectual legerdemain may be indulged in, that sort of system can not be justified. It means literally the economic and commercial murder of the interior points, for every man who knows anything about rates understands that upon rates of transportation depends the development of a country. Given an advantage of a few cents a ton, or a few mills per hundred pounds, upon goods that are to be shipped, the locality having that advantage can gather to itself factories and industries and wealth. Change the conditions against it, and that city or town can be made substantially a whistling post, its development arrested, and the entire country dependent upon it correspondingly injured.

Freight rates or transportation rates are the key to the industrial development of any part of the country. An unjust freight rate militates against and constitutes a robbery of entire communities, and may constitute a despoliation of the peoples of entire States, for the freight rate is added, in the end, to the prices paid by the consumers. If, for instance, the State of Utah, or the State of Idaho, or the State of Colorado, or the State of Missouri has an unjust freight rate, it follows that every one of the inhabitants in those States is taxed on everything he consumes and which has to be shipped, and that tax constitutes a burden upon him which he pays for the benefit of the citizen of some favored part of the United States.

That is an intolerable condition, and it ought not to be allowed to continue. The long-and-short-haul provision has been before the Congress many times. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] yesterday recited its history. In verification of what he then said I recall that at the time the bill providing that there should not be more charged for a long haul than for a short haul was before the committees of Congress, it was insisted that the words "except under special conditions" should be inserted and that that would be a full protection to the public and yet allow the Interstate Commerce Commission in some rare and exceptional cases to provide against what might otherwise prove to be calamitous. It is also true, as said by the Senator from Nevada, that the Interstate Commerce Commission seizing upon that clause has to all intents and purposes perpetuated the system exactly as it was before the amendment was adopted, and the clause to which I referred, "except under special conditions," was inserted at the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The truth is the Interstate Commerce Commission has so often plainly by its rulings defeated the purpose of the legislation of Congress that I am getting in the humor to ask that the commission be abolished. It seems to be impossible to get the commission to move when it is necessary to have prompt action to save the situation. It seems to me that it is about as thoroughly controlled by the railroads as the boards of directors of the several roads are controlled by the great financial interests which furnish their capital. I have no warfare to make upon railroads, but I say that the sooner the railroads conclude to adopt the policy of absolutely fair, just, and impartial dealings with the public, the sooner they will make friends and the sooner they will make for prosperity.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] asked me—and I regret that he has left the Chamber—what effect the amendment would have where there is water competition?

I hold to the theory that every locality is entitled to the benefit of its natural advantages. If it is located where water traffic is available, it is entitled to that advantage and no one should take it away. If another locality is situated close to a market it is entitled to that natural advantage, and no law and no ruling of the tribunal should take away that advantage. So that if a city is located, as is New York or New Orleans, upon the ocean or immediately accessible to the ocean no one should try to frame freight rates to disadvantage those cities merely because they have water advantages. Neither should there be a law enacted nor a system inaugurated which would deny to any part of the country such advantages as it may have by closer proximity to the market than other places which happen to have the benefits of water transportation. Either one of these artificial interferences with natural conditions and advantages is unjustifiable.

Upon the other hand, because a city or country may have the benefit of natural water transportation and another community may not have the benefit of water transportation, it is equally unjustifiable to levy a tribute in the form of freight rates upon the community which is deprived of water transportation for the purpose of giving to the place that already has the natural advantage of water transportation the additional and artificial advantage created by law, one which it does not possess naturally, but which is conferred upon it by arbitrary action.

Such a course can not be justified. Moreover such a course does not make for the good of the country. The symmetrical development of all parts of our country is a policy of wisdom which no man ought to doubt.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEBLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator can understand, I think, the resentment—perhaps I have used too strong a word—the feeling that they have been discriminated against, the feeling of exasperation upon the part of some of the interior portions of our country which are denied access to water, when they see enormous appropriations for rivers and harbors and then find those discriminations by the railroads against them as the result of which it is absolutely impossible for any industrial or economic development to occur.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Answering the question now with special reference to river transportation, the towns along the great rivers of our country, just as the towns along the great seacoasts of the country, are entitled to the natural advantage they have through the existence of the waterways, and a proper development of the waterways is justifiable because as a result of the expenditure of a comparatively small amount of money an enormous traffic can be carried upon the waters. That is only giving them the natural advantage to which they are entitled. But going along with that there certainly should not be a scheme which deprives the dry-land town, if you please, of its right to be treated the same as the water town so far as freight rates are concerned. I may be criticized for saying that because I live in one of the towns that has the benefit of a river, and that I hope to see improved.

But let us see whether the making of equitable freight rates and the abolition of the custom of levying too high freight rates upon one part of the country for the benefit of others will not result in benefit even to river transportation. I have not the figures here, but the astonishing fact exists that the railroads which parallel the Mississippi River, running, speaking generally, from the North to the South across our country, are carrying freight on those parallel lines for a rate which I think is less than one-quarter of the average rate charged over the United States. I shall be glad to get those figures and put them in the RECORD. What does that mean? It means that because the river is there, although only half improved, the railroads in order to get that freight have cut their rates. The result naturally was that when they first inaugurated that system they destroyed the river transportation and continued to destroy river transportation by the maintenance of that character of rates. There are certain kinds of freight, and the kinds are very widely diversified, that can be carried upon those rivers. It can be carried there without the destruction of the railroads. No one with any common sense wants to destroy the railroads. The whole country can be developed by virtue of the cheaper freight rates that come through river transportation.

Now, let me say that those rates thus made upon that river are not confined in their benefits to the lines along the river. Those who are in charge of the boat lines upon the Mississippi River have been fighting and struggling with this same Interstate Commerce Commission to get it to compel the inauguration of just joint rates between the boat lines and the railroads touching the river points. They have had one of the most uphill fights ever waged. It has seemed to me that the Interstate Commerce Commission has acted in a manner wholly unjustifiable in the matter of inaugurating joint rates. But the boat lines have practically succeeded, and the result is that the benefit of the lower freight rates upon the Mississippi River has inured to communities and States hundreds of miles removed from the river, for whenever we can establish a system of boats that will carry freight as cheaply from St. Louis to New Orleans and then can establish joint rates the great States lying to the west and northwest can claim the advantage of those joint rates and get the same advantage from river traffic that the towns along the river receive, or approximately the same advantage.

But we have had a policy which seems to me to be merely stubborn, if not worse. I can illustrate that. There is a boat line operating Government-owned boats on the Mississippi River and also on the Warrior River. The boat line on the Mississippi River, although there are bars across the river, and although transportation is sadly interfered with—and, by way of parenthesis, I will say that every interference could be removed by the expenditure of a few million dollars—has actually made money, and with proper capital it can be made a very profitable enterprise. It has been carrying freight at 80 per cent of the charge of the railroads, although the competition it meets is that of the railroads which have already cut their rates to the bone in order to hold the traffic against the boats.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Right on that point, I wish to say a word. The Senator from Missouri has already said that these Government barges, if they desire a part of the traffic, can not charge over 80 per cent of what the railroads charge.

Mr. REED of Missouri. They do not charge over 80 per cent of what the railroads charge.

Mr. PITTMAN. They can not do it successfully, it is held, because of the more expeditious moving of freight by rail, we will say——

Mr. REED of Missouri. I think they do it in order to get the business.

Mr. PITTMAN. I also call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the rates on the railroads with which they are now competing are only 58 per cent of the average charge of the railroads somewhere else. The Senator says that these barges are commencing to make money. I think he is right that they can make money, but here is the point: At the present time the discriminations of the railroads are not at the maximum; the fear is not so much for existing conditions but that the Interstate Commerce Commission will grant all of these applications to lower still further the rates at competitive points; and when that happens, the boats go out of business. In other words, Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Missouri that no careful concern can go into business under existing conditions when they are threatened with a reduction of competitive rates by the railroads below a point at which their boats can make money. That threat is pending with the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day in the form of applications. Those applications will be granted if the criterion established by the Interstate Commerce Commission is not abolished by this amendment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada has stated the case very well. I was diverted, however, from the particular thing I was going to say. I have spoken of the Mississippi River. On the Warrior River, where the equipment was inadequate and other conditions somewhat adverse, the Government agency operating a line of boats found itself confronted with this situation: The railroads refused to establish joint rates; and frequently, where the boat haul was ten times the rail haul, the railroads took from 75 to 80, and I believe in some instances even 90 per cent of the total tolls collected. When that case was brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission—a case which seemed to appeal for immediate relief and drastic action—the commission held the case for many months, finally laid down some general rules, and then told the parties to get together and agree.

I am becoming completely and utterly disgusted with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I repeat, I am not here contending as an enemy of railroads. The railroads we must have, and they must be allowed to earn an adequate return or they will cease to exist, and certainly they will cease to make improvements. They must be fairly and justly treated; but because we should fairly and justly treat the railroads is no reason why we should allow injustices to be perpetrated upon vast sections of this land and communities milked for the benefit of other communities or for the building of certain terminals in which the railroads are particularly interested.

Let us settle this question upon its merits and in accordance with the principles of equity. I say no man on earth can justify hauling freight through a town hundreds and perhaps thousands of miles and then hauling it back at a cheaper rate than it could be hauled on the direct route and unloaded. That is a waste of time, a waste of energy, and a manifest wrong. There is no sense in building up one community at the expense of another. There is no sense in undertaking to foster railroads, to the total destruction of water transportation or to its injury, any more than there would be sense in a farmer feeding his horses more than they needed to eat and allowing his cattle to starve to death, or a man looking after one business and pouring into it unnecessary moneys and allowing another branch to go bankrupt. Particularly is this unjustifiable when we have regard to the fact that the railroads of the country are merely the highways of the people, and that the people have the right to fair, just, and equitable treatment, regardless of the particular portion of the country in which they live, and at the same time the roads are entitled to live and to make a decent return upon their just investment.

There has been a great deal said here in the way of attacking the railroads that can not be justified when the facts are thoroughly thrashed out, and there have been some criticisms that are, of course, just. The Pittman amendment, in my judgment, is in the right direction. Whether it goes far enough or not we can only determine upon trial, for it may be that the ingenuity of the Interstate Commerce Commission will again find some means by which it can nullify an act of Congress.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, it is indeed gratifying to find a Senator within whose State great cities are located who insists on a square deal for all the people of the State which he represents. The great city of St. Louis has been benefited by the violation of the fourth section by receiving cheaper freight rates than other communities in the great State of Missouri; but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in this instance, as he always does, stands for an American principle, for if there is anything that the American people demand it is a square deal for all. When a railroad hauls freight 2,000 miles or 3,000 miles, in some cases, for a less charge than they make for a shorter haul—and they are asking to extend that practice now—it is unfair and unjust and must be and is un-American. So I repeat it is reassuring to know that in this fight for a square deal for the people who live in the interior States of the Union, and especially for the people who live in the interior States of the West, the able Senator from Missouri is championing their cause.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the profile map of the Monongahela River, which I have had placed on the wall. I first saw this map at one of the interesting hearings on Muscle Shoals before the Agricultural Committee of the Senate. I was so much impressed with the great work that the Government has done on the Monongahela River in making possible transportation for low-priced basic materials that I asked Mr. E. G. Waldo, a civil engineer employed by the Tennessee River Improvement Association, for the loan of this map. The map indicated to my mind the opportunity that lies before the American people for the development of water transportation.

Railroads cross the Monongahela River at eight different points, but there are no violations of the fourth section in that immediate territory, and the result is that in 1920 upon this river there were carried 24,000,000 tons of coal and coal products. It is carrying on an average now something like 18,000,000 tons a year. It has been a mighty factor in making Pittsburgh one of the great steel centers of the world.

This is a Government project, and what a story it tells! There are 15 different locks on the Monongahela River which are operated by the Government itself. In 1889 the Government purchased these locks from the Monongahela Navigation Co., a private concern. The length of the river that is in operation is 130 miles. The Government paid for the locks and improvements of the river at the time $4,300,000, and since then has expended something like $6,000,000 for the operation and maintenance of those locks. No toll is charged upon this river. I suspect that the steel companies of Pittsburgh have been the beneficiaries of this Government expenditure.

Mr. President, it seems strange to me that this Government will spend $10,000,000 in the purchase and operation of a river project for the transportation of freight, and at the same time through its organization, the Interstate Commerce Commission, deny to the people of the Western States and the Southern States a chance to have water transportation, by permitting railroads to charge a lower freight rate for the longer haul than for the shorter haul where they come in competition with water transportation, so that the boats have been driven off of the rivers in the South and have been partly driven out of the Panama Canal and our coastwise routes.

It is strange, is it not, that a policy that is right for the East is not just as right for the people of the South and the people of the West? Yet that does not seem to be the case at the present time.

I was impressed with this map because some day the Government will build a reservoir somewhere near the headwaters of this river, and the floods on that river, that at times do a great deal of damage, causing loss of property and loss of life, will be under complete control.

I am familiar with and understand very fully what flood control means, for in our Western States many of our great rivers now are controlled through a reservoir system which not only holds and controls all the flood water but holds all the water that flows down those rivers the year around. Flood control in this country is going to be one of the simplest and easiest problems that we have to meet. I live on an irrigation project in my own State, that controls and holds all the water that flows down the river and that furnishes water for the irrigation of something like 100,000 acres of land. So the problems of flood control in this country are simple.

If it had not been for this Government project in 1920, when they carried down the Monongahela River 24,000,000 tons of freight—the year when we had the railroad congestion and blockade—the steel plants of Pittsburgh would have been forced to close down. The West is not asking the Government to go out there and develop a project like that and spend its money. I am glad that the Government has done this, because it has demonstrated the necessity of what to my mind is more essential for America than any other one thing is before this country to-day, and that is adequate transportation. Without it this country will be forced to come to a standstill. It is going to be impossible to build enough railroads to carry the low-priced farm products and the low-priced basic materials of the country, nor can we compete for the trade of the world if we are forced to transport all of those cheap products over the long hauls to market. By every right the coal from the coal mines and the wheat from the wheat fields, where it is possible, should be permitted to seek the nearest water transportation; but this Government policy has forced practically all of the farmer's wheat to be shipped east over a long haul of railroads, that are manned by the most expensive labor in all the world, and in that condition freight rates are necessarily high.

Mr. President, the World War brought us a new world. We have in this country to-day the highest cost of production of any country on earth. Wages here are higher than in any other country, anywhere from 75 to 300 per cent higher. When Germany comes back to normal, with its cheap cost of production as against the high cost of production in this country, unless we do something to move the low-priced farm products and the low-priced basic materials to the furnace and the factory and the market we shall be unable to compete successfully; for the competition for the trade of the world in the future, as I see it, is going to be keen and sharp and severe. We have been prosperous in this country only because the balance of trade has been in our favor. From the beginning of the war up to last year we had a balance of trade in our favor of something like $21,000,000,000, three times as much as we had in all the preceding years since the foundation of this Government was laid; but last year, 1923, our imports exceeded our exports by only $370,000,000. Up to the 1st of September of 1923 the balance of trade was against us in this country; and even with the high protective tariff that we have in this country, with the cheap cost of production there is in foreign countries, I do not believe that it is going to be possible to have a balance of trade in our favor. I believe this country is facing the most dangerous period in its history; and yet we go along blindly and permit the railroads to increase freight rates, the peak of which was 78 per cent above pre-war freight rates, and the present level is 55 per cent above the pre-war level, without any thought or consideration for the future of transportation in this country. The railroads are not keeping pace with the development of commerce. As I showed in my remarks yesterday, there has been only a little over 100 per cent of an increase in miles of tracks in this country in the last 33 years, while at the same time there has been 443 per cent of an increase of traffic in this country.

Only three years ago, I think, some of the railroads put an embargo on perishable fruits from California. They refused to handle them. They were so congested with transportation, if you please, that they would not accept this class of freight at all, and they were only moved by the Interstate Commerce Commission to accept it.

Mr. President, I hope Senators will give this map a little attention, and see what is possible on every other river in the United States, and see what will be possible with the development of that river in the development of electric power.

The Government is now considering building at this point a power plant that will develop something like 50,000 horsepower. It will pay back to the Government all of its expenses in a few years and all of the money that it has paid out for operation. We can generate in this country on our great rivers more power than any other country in the world with the exception of Africa, and it will have to be developed in order to make possible cheaper production all along the line, and we can not commence that work any too soon.

I am ready to go along with the development of Muscle Shoals, Mr. President. I am ready to go along with the building of the St. Lawrence ship canal. It will bring the Atlantic Ocean a thousand miles farther inland. I am ready to go along with the development of the Mississippi and all the rest of the great rivers of the country; but before I do that, Mr. President, I want to know that the money that this Government expends in that development can not be destroyed by the railroads by permitting them to haul freight on the longer hauls cheaper by more than 100 per cent in some cases than on the shorter hauls; and until I can be assured that this policy is not going to be continued I am not going to vote for any appropriation for rivers and harbors.

Now, Mr. President, I want again to take up some of these discriminations and violations of the fourth section of the interstate commerce act. I want to take up again the violations on wool.

The present freight rate on wool in bales in carload lots from San Francisco to Boston, a distance of 3,300 miles, is $1.50 a hundred. The rate on wool in bales from Salt Lake City, Utah, to Boston, a distance of 2,553 miles, is $2.36 a hundred. Although the distance from Salt Lake City, Utah, is 744 miles shorter than the distance from San Francisco, the rate on wool per hundred is 86 cents more than it is from San Francisco.

The rate on wool in bales from Reno, Nev., to Boston, a distance of 3,055 miles, is $2.38½ a hundred. While the distance from Reno to Boston is 245 miles shorter, yet the rate from Reno to Boston is 88½ cents higher than it is from San Francisco.

I come now to violations of the fourth section on the Santa Fe Railroad.

The present rate on wool in bales in carload lots from San Francisco to Boston, a distance of 3,578 miles, is $1.50 a hundred. The rate on wool in bales from Prescott, Ariz., to Boston, a distance of 2,939 miles, is $2.44½ a hundred. The distance from Prescott, Ariz., to San Francisco is 639 miles. So the haul from Prescott to Boston is 639 miles shorter, and yet they will pay a rate of 94½ cents a hundred more on wool than the rate from San Francisco.

Violations on wool on the Northern Pacific: The present freight rate on wool in bales by carload lots from Seattle to Boston, a distance of 3,352 miles, is $1.50 a hundred. The rate from Spokane, a distance of 2,953 miles, is $2 a hundred.

The rate on wool in bales from Fargo, N. Dak., to Boston, a distance of 1,700 miles, is $1.47½ a hundred. Although the distance from Fargo, N. Dak., is 1,652 miles less than the distance from Seattle to Boston, the rate is only 2½ cents less.

On the Great Northern the wool rate is the same as on all the transcontinental railroads, $1.50 a hundred. From Grand Forks, N. Dak., to Boston, a distance of 1,768 miles, the rate is $1.53 a hundred. The distance from Grand Forks, N. Dak., is 1,455 miles less than the distance from Seattle. Yet they are paying 3 cents a hundred more on wool than the people of Seattle.

PROPOSED VIOLATION OF THE FOURTH SECTION ASKED FOR BY THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC

On dry goods in carload lots from Chicago to San Francisco by the way of the Illinois Central, New Orleans, and Southern Pacific, a distance of 3,408 miles, the present freight rate is $1.58 per hundred. The railroads have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rate from Chicago to San Francisco of $1.10 per hundred.

From Chicago to Greenville, Miss., on the Illinois Central, a distance of 747 miles, the present rate is $1.10 per hundred.

If this application is allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the people at Greenville, Miss., will pay the same rate as the people of San Francisco, although the haul will be 2,661 miles longer than to Greenville, Miss.

From Chicago to Amesville, La., a distance of 931 miles, the rate on dry goods in carload lots is $1.58 per hundred. The present rate to San Francisco is $1.58.

At the present time the people of Amesville, La., and at all points west on the Southern Pacific are paying the same freight rates on dry goods as those in San Francisco pay. If this fourth section violation is allowed to the Southern Pacific, the people of Amesville, La., will continue to pay a freight rate of $1.58 per hundred on dry goods, but the people of San Francisco will pay a rate of $1.10 a hundred for a haul that is 2,477 miles longer than the haul from Chicago to Amesville, La.

On horseshoes in car lots from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 3,408 miles, the present rate is $1 per hundred. The railroads have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rate from Chicago to San Francisco of 75 cents per hundred.

From Chicago to Schriever, La., a distance of 976 miles, the present rate is $1 per hundred.

If this application is allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the people of Schriever, La., will pay the same rate as do the people of San Francisco, although the haul will be 2,432 miles longer than to Schriever, La.

From Chicago to Sugarland, Tex., a distance of 1,208 miles, the rate on horseshoes in carload lots is $1 per hundred. The present rate to San Francisco is $1 per hundred.

At the present time the people of Sugarland, Tex., and all points west, on the Southern Pacific, are paying the same freight rate on horseshoes as is paid at San Francisco. If this fourth section violation is allowed the Southern Pacific, the people of Sugarland, Tex., will continue to pay a rate of $1 per hundred on horseshoes, but the people of San Francisco will pay a rate for a haul that is 2,200 miles longer than the haul from Chicago to Sugarland, Tex., of 75 cents.

Here are some proposed violations of the fourth section asked for by the Santa Fe Railroad: On dry goods in carload lots from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 2,540 miles, the present rate is $1.58 a hundred. The same application has been made by all the transcontinental railroads. They are asking for a reduction to $1.10 a hundred.

If these violations are allowed from Quenemo, Kans., the people of that city will continue to pay $1.58 a hundred on carload lots, which is the present rate to San Francisco, but San Francisco will have $1.10 a hundred, while Quenemo will be paying $1.58, although the haul is 2,017 miles longer from this Kansas town to San Francisco than it is from Chicago to Quenemo.

On ammunition in carload lots from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 2,540 miles, the present rate is $1.40 a hundred. The railroads are asking for a rate of $1 a hundred.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator has just alluded to the rate which the railroads are asking now from Chicago to San Francisco of $1.10. I presume there is no accompanying proposal that they will reduce the rates charged upon freight shipped from Chicago to intermediate points. They are going to maintain the same high levels of rates which now exist from Chicago to all intermediate points?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. KING. So, of course, they would build up Chicago, perhaps, and San Francisco or the port towns at the expense of all the intermediate sections.

Mr. GOODING. That is the object of it, of course, together with the idea of destroying water transportation, which is the primary object. That has been the struggle, and on the side of the railroads has been this Government, represented by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and its work has been complete.

All these violations, which cover 50 commodities, are applications, as far as freight reduction is concerned, to Pacific coast terminals. No point on this side that I am aware of gets any reduction at all. It means, of course, a destruction of our jobbing interests in the interior country. We will not be able to serve our own people in the simplest way.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator before him any of the rates showing the highest levels to any intermediate point between Chicago and San Francisco?

Mr. GOODING. The highest points?

Mr. KING. The highest level upon any of those 50 articles, if the Senator has the rates before him. If not, I do not want to interrupt the orderly arrangement of his remarks. I presume the highest rate between Chicago and San Francisco at some intermediate point would be very much in excess of the $1.10 which they are now asking as the rate from Chicago to San Francisco.

Mr. GOODING. The highest level reached at the intermediate point is the present Pacific coast rate of $1.58, which is blanketed back from the Pacific coast to Ogallala, Nebr., which is 820 miles west of Chicago.

The figures I have show that 48 per cent is the greatest reduction they are asking for. I have not all the figures in connection with this application before me at this time, however.

From Chicago to Raton, N. Mex., a distance of 1,098 miles, the rate on ammunition in carload lots is $1.40 a hundred. The present rate to San Francisco is $1.40 a hundred. If the rate is reduced, of course the people in San Francisco will have a rate of $1.10, while the people of Raton, N. Mex., will continue to pay a rate of $1.40 a hundred. The haul from Chicago to San Francisco is 1,444 miles longer than it is from Chicago to Raton.

On bolts in carload lots from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 2,540 miles, the present rate is $1 a hundred. The railroads are asking for a reduction to 75 cents a hundred. From Chicago to Newton, Kans., on the Santa Fe, a distance of 636 miles, the present rate is 75 cents a hundred. If this application is allowed the people of Newton will be paying the same price the people of San Francisco pay, although the haul to San Francisco is 1,904 miles longer than it is to Newton, Kans.

From Chicago to Dalies, N. Mex., a distance of 1,306 miles, the rate on bolts in carload lots is $1 a hundred. If this application is allowed the people at that point will continue to pay $1 a hundred, while the people of San Francisco will have a rate of 75 cents a hundred. At no place at any intermediate point do the railroads propose to reduce a single rate from the present rates which they have in effect.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. DILL. If these rates were granted and the net revenues of the railroads were not sufficient to meet the payment of interest on the bonded indebtedness, the next application would be to increase the rates to the interior. Would not that be the natural result?

Mr. GOODING. Not at all. If the railroads would permit the Senator's great State to develop in the interior, and all the rest of the interior Western States to develop, they would have to double-track their lines to take care of their business.

Mr. DILL. I do not think the Senator understood my question.

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I understood the Senator's question. I am coming to a more direct answer to it. The controversy at the present time is over about 2 per cent or less of the business of the railroads that is now going through the Panama Canal. There is no doubt, in my judgment, that if the rates are reduced to San Francisco the railroads will not earn as much money as they are earning at the present time with the rates they have in force. That is not the object at all. The object is to do just what the transcontinental railroads have always said they would do, and that is, if possible, to make it so that pond lilies would grow in the channels of the Panama Canal. There is no question about what the railroads are fighting for—a monopoly.

Mr. DILL. But if there should be a raise in rates, necessarily, under present conditions, the application would be to raise the rates to the interior points and not to the coast or water points.

Mr. GOODING. That is what this has the effect of doing.

Mr. DILL. That is what I understood.

Mr. GOODING. It lowers the rates to the coast points. I think most of the merchants of the country take the position that they are not so much interested in what the freight rate is as that they shall not have any discrimination or that some other merchant in some other town shall not have a lower freight rate than they have. Of course, the merchant is able to pass the freight on to the consumers. The farmers are interested in lower freight rates on farm products, for he pays the freight going and coming—he is not able to pass it on. With the high freight rates which we are forced to pay over the long haul to eastern markets, agriculture in the Senator's State and mine and all the interior States of the West is not even getting a fighting chance.

The Government made two horizontal increases in freight rates. They increased the rates on all low-priced farm products with the exception of wheat and livestock. The first increase made by Director of Railroads McAdoo was 25 per cent. When the Interstate Commerce Commission made its increase from 25 per cent to 40 per cent, and 33⅓ per cent as between different zones, it did not make any distinction at all as to low-priced farm products. The result is that we have to-day low-priced farm products in the West in some cases paying 3,000 per cent higher freight rates according to its value than some of the manufactured articles of the East, for the maintenance and upkeep of the railroads.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOODING. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. Can the Senator tell us, in view of this request, if permission to lower the freight rates at competing points with water transportation should be granted, whether there was any general request made by the railways a year or two ago to reduce the freight rates on farm products that could not be moved to market without such a reduction? Does the Senator recall any instance in which the railroads appealed to the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to lower the rates in order that the farm products might be moved to market?

Mr. GOODING. I have no knowledge of any such application on the part of the railroads. I do know that President Harding tried very hard to get the Interstate Commerce Commission and the railroads, when the reduction of 10 per cent was made, to give that 10 per cent reduction to farm products and the low basic materials of the country, and that six members of the Interstate Commerce Commission refused to do it, five voting for it, and the railroads refused to give any reduction or to give the 10 per cent reduction to farm products and the basic materials that were suffering from the horizontal increase of freight rates that had been made.

Mr. KENDRICK. In fact, the Senator does not know that in many instances and in many localities in the West it was found impossible to move farm products to market because of the prohibitive rates, and a great many of the products were therefore allowed to waste because of the impossibility to market them?

Mr. GOODING. In my own State thousands of carloads of potatoes could not be moved to market.

Mr. KENDRICK. The same was true in my State.

Mr. GOODING. At times it was pretty hard, with the low prices of some kinds of livestock, to move it to market. This year my people were not able to move the finest red apples that grow in America without paying in advance the freight rates. Trains of refrigerator cars of prunes passed up the valley of the Snake River that brought back to the railroads $36,000 in freight rates, but not a penny to the prune grower. He had to guarantee the freight rates and pay any loss, and yet they would not reduce the freight rates. When agriculture was suffering, the wheat growers of the West appealed to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a reduction of freight rates, but one of the commissioners said, "Why do they want to grow wheat if they can not make a living? Why do they not grow something else?" Another one of the commissioners said, "Why don't they get off the farms if they can not make a living there?" This Government is responsible for the condition of the wheat growers and the condition of the farms, but that is the expression we get from the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am sorry to say—I am going to say it, however—that a majority of them are just mere tools for the railroad corporations. I think a thorough investigation would prove that beyond the question of a doubt.

Many of the farmers are forced to grow wheat because they can not grow anything else. They have no machinery to grow anything else. Prosperity has been destroyed. My God, they have not been able in some States to buy a mere plain coffin to bury the dead of their families, and yet the Interstate Commerce Commission, to which we appeal, says, "Why don't they grow something else or why don't they get off the farms?" when they have, without any consideration at all or any investigation, increased the freight rates 33⅓ per cent.

Now, when we talk to them about reduction of freight rates they say it will take years to bring it about.

When Mr. McAdoo was appointed director of railroads he made a horizontal increase in three days after he was appointed, of 25 per cent, but he made exception as far as wheat and livestock were concerned and provided that no increase on wheat should be more than 6 cents a hundred, and that no rate on livestock should be increased more than 7 cents a hundred. Even a schoolboy understands that low-priced farm products can not bear the increase, where the freight rate is already high, as does the manufactured article. The railroads have always given some consideration heretofore to what a product would bear to carry it to market. They have usually taken all it would bear to carry it to market, or so nearly so at least that there has not been much left for agriculture in the past. When the Government forced freight rates on the farmer that were 65 per cent of an increase, they destroyed the American farmer and destroyed his prosperity everywhere, and made it impossible for him to ship many of his products to market. All we ask in Idaho—and my State is only 350 miles from tidewater—is an opportunity to go to tidewater with our cheap farm products; but with their policy of excessive freight rates, we are forced over the long haul to the eastern market.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GOODING. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator's speech is able and penetrating, and I agree with him so fully that, although I know I will mar the symmetry of his speech, I can not resist making the observation at this time that the dwellers in the city complain seriously and justly about the high prices of farm products. Now is an opportunity for the representatives of the dwellers in the cities to in some way help equalize the rates so that the farmer may bring his produce to the city at a reasonable rate.

The Senator's speech is one of the most valuable contributions he has made to the public service. I almost envy him the ability and courage he displays in making it. He is saying things that ought to have been said long ago. I hope that those who come from the large cities, where they must have every morning a fresh supply of food for their subsistence, will give consideration to this important question of at least equalizing the rates.

My State, strange, is noted not only as a metal-producing State but as an agricultural State. We have a great opportunity in the southwest to become an agricultural country, but we are paralyzed and strangled by the unjust discrimination inhering of the so-called long-and-short haul. We are anxious to sent the cantaloupe to the tables of the East. We are anxious to send other agricultural products to the East, but the long-and-short haul and its vicious and unjust discrimination makes it practically impossible to do so.

Mr. GOODING. I thank the Senator for his kind words. There have been occasions in my life when I wished that my early training or occupation might have been along different lines. When I had wanted to express myself so that I might be understood, I have sometimes wished that I might have been a lawyer, but those were only passing fancies with me. I am glad that my life has been that of a farmer and stock grower out in the great open, out in the mighty West. I do have in presenting this question a feeling so deadly in earnest that possibly if I had the early training of the Senator from Arizona and his ability I might make myself better understood.

Mr. ASHURST. I reciprocate the kind words of the Senator, but the Senator need not fear that the words will be misunderstood. They are good, plain, strong English words, and there will be no person in this country who will fail to comprehend them because they are so plain and so strong that he who runs may read.

Mr. GOODING. I thank the Senator again. I want to get back to the observation the Senator made about dwellers of the cities. None are more interested in the prosperity of the farmer and in seeing that he has reasonable freight rates than are the dwellers of the cities—the men who work for day pay—because the farmer has been the best customer of their toil. No class of people in America or any place in the world spend money more freely than do the American farmers. They want to live, to educate their children, and to have the same opportunities that the people have who follow other occupations in the country. But if the time shall ever come in this country when the farmer is driven back to the old gray mare to go to market and those who live off of the toils of the farmer are able to honk him off of the road with their limousines, then we shall have reached the end of this civilization.

What I am fighting for are freight rates without discrimination. This is vital to the American citizen who tills the soil and who has made this country the mightiest country in all the world. He has been the pioneer of America. He has blazed the trail; he has cut away the great forests; has built our roads; has subdued the desert; has made a thousand blades of grass grow where none grew before; and has made it possible for those who followed him in after years to enjoy peace, prosperity, and happiness in the great West; but now he is confronted by an application for freight rates, which, if granted, will give his competitor 1,000 or 2,000 miles farther toward the Pacific coast cheaper transportation than he is privileged to enjoy. It is un-American; it is a crime against civilization; and there is no doubt in my mind that, properly presented, it would be decided to be unconstitutional.

I desire at this point to refer to some violations on the Northern Pacific Railroad. On dry goods in carload lots from Chicago to Seattle, a distance of 2,314 miles, the rate is $1.58 a hundred. The rates on dry goods are all $1.58 per hundred at the present time. From Chicago to Detroit, Minn., on the Northern Pacific, a distance of 613 miles, the present rate is $1.10 a hundred. If this application is allowed, the people of Detroit, Minn., will be paying $1.10 per hundred, the same as the people at Seattle, although the distance is 1,700 miles longer than it is to Detroit, Minn.

From Chicago to Steele, N. Dak., a distance of 812 miles, the rate on dry goods in carload lots is $1.58 a hundred, the same as it is to Seattle at the present time. If the application of the railroads be allowed, the people in this town of North Dakota will continue to pay $1.58 a hundred and all the people west, in North Dakota and Montana, will be paying $1.58 a hundred, while the people of Seattle will be receiving a carload lot of dry goods for $1.10 a hundred.

Mr. President, I have a number of similar illustrations, comprising but few, however, of those which might be cited. With the permission of the Senate, I ask to have them incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROPOSED VIOLATIONS OF THE FOURTH SECTION ASKED FOR BY THE NORTHERN PACIFIC

On soap in carloads from Chicago to Seattle, Wash., a distance of 2,314 miles, the present freight rate is $1.25 per hundred.

The railroads have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rate from Chicago to Seattle of $1 per hundred.

From Chicago to New Salem, N. Dak., a distance of 889 miles, the present rate is $1 per hundred.

If this application is allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the people of New Salem, N. Dak., will pay the same rate as the people of Seattle, although the haul will be 1,425 miles longer than to New Salem, N. Dak.

From Chicago to Sentinel Butte, N. Dak., a distance of 1,027 miles, the rate on soap in car lots is $1.25 per hundred.

The present rate to Seattle is $1.25 per hundred.

At the present time the people of Sentinel Butte, N. Dak., and all points west on the Northern Pacific are paying the same freight rate on soap as Seattle. If this fourth-section violation is allowed the Northern Pacific, the people of Sentinel Butte, N. Dak., will continue to pay a freight rate of $1.25 per hundred on soap, but the people of Seattle will pay a rate for a haul that is 1,287 miles longer than the haul from Chicago to Sentinel Butte, N. Dak., of $1.25 per hundred.

On roofing material on car lots from Chicago to Seattle, Wash., a distance of 2,314 miles, the present freight rate is $1.10 per hundred.

The railroads have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rate from Chicago to Seattle of $0.90 per hundred.

From Chicago to South Heart, N. Dak., on the Northern Pacific, a distance of 996 miles, the present rate is $0.90 per hundred.

If this application is allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the people of South Heart, N. Dak., will pay the same rate as the people of Seattle, although the haul will be 1,318 miles longer than to South Heart, N. Dak.

From Chicago to Beach, N. Dak., a distance of 1,036 miles, the rate on roofing material in carload lots is $1.10 per hundred.

The present rate to Seattle is $1.10 per hundred.

At the present time the people of Beach, N. Dak., and all points west on the Northern Pacific are paying the same freight rates on roofing material as Seattle. If this fourth-section violation is allowed the Northern Pacific, the people of Beach, N. Dak., will continue to pay a freight rate of $1.10 per hundred on roofing material, but the people of Seattle will pay a rate for a haul that is 1,278 miles longer than the haul from Chicago to Beach, N. Dak., of $1.10 per hundred.

FOURTH SECTION VIOLATIONS BY THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL

On dry goods from Chicago to Meridian, Miss., a distance of 712 miles, the freight rate is $1.82 per 100.

The railroads have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission to be permitted to make a rate from Chicago to New Orleans, a distance of 912 miles, on dry goods in carload lots of $1.53½ per 100.

If this application is allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the people of Meridian, Miss., will have to pay for a 200-mile shorter haul than the haul from Chicago to New Orleans, a freight rate of 28½ cents more per 100 pounds.

The present rate on dry goods in carload lots from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 3,408 miles, is $1.58 per 100.

The present rate to Meridian, Miss., a distance of 712 miles, is $1.82 per 100.

Although the haul from Chicago to Meridian, Miss., is 2,796 miles shorter, the people of Meridian pay 34 cents per 100 more.

The railroads have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission to be permitted to make a rate of $1.10 per 100 from Chicago to San Francisco.

If the commission permits them to make a rate of $1.10 per 100, the people of Meridian, Miss., will have to pay for a haul that is 2,796 miles shorter, a freight rate of 72 cents more per 100.

PROPOSED VIOLATION OF THE FOURTH SECTION ASKED FOR BY CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC, AND SOUTHERN PACIFIC

On dry goods in carload lots from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 2,760 miles, the present freight rate is $1.58 per 100.

The railroads have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rate from Chicago to San Francisco of $1.10 per 100.

From Chicago to Willard, Kans., on the Rock Island, a distance of 601 miles, the present rate is $1.10 per 100.

If this application is allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the people of Willard, Kans., will pay the same rate as the people of San Francisco, although the haul will be 2,159 miles longer than to Willard, Kans.

From Chicago to Haviland, Kans., a distance of 749 miles, the rate on dry goods is $1.58 per 100.

The present rate to San Francisco is $1.58 per 100.

At the present time the people of Haviland, Kans., and all points West on the Rock Island and Southern Pacific are paying the same freight rate on dry goods as San Francisco. If this fourth section violation is allowed the Rock Island and Southern Pacific, the people of Haviland, Kans., will continue to pay a freight rate of $1.58 on dry goods, but the people of San Francisco will pay a rate for a haul that is 2,011 miles longer than the haul from Chicago to Haviland, Kans. of $1.10 per 100.

On bolts and nuts, in carload lots, from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 2,640 miles, the present freight rate is $1 per 100.

The railroads have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rate from Chicago to San Francisco of 75 cents per 100.

The present rate from Chicago to Lebanon, Kans., on the Rock Island, a distance of 704 miles, is 75 cents per 100.

It this application is allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the people of Lebanon, Kans., will pay the same rate as the people of San Francisco, although the haul will be 1,836 miles longer than to Lebanon, Kans.

From Chicago to Brewster, Kans., a distance of 868 miles (on the Rock Island) the rate on bolts and nuts in carload lots is $1 per 100.

The present rate to San Francisco is $1 per 100. At the present time the people of Brewster, Kans., and all points west on the Rock Island and Southern Pacific are paying the same freight rate on bolts and nuts as San Francisco.

If this fourth-section violation is allowed the Rock Island and Southern Pacific, the people of Brewster, Kans., will continue to pay a freight rate for a haul that is 1,772 miles longer than the haul from Chicago to Brewster, Kans., of $1 per 100.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, at the present time not all the transcontinental railroads are making a fight for the privilege to violate section 4 of the interstate commerce act. They have asked for it, but there has been a division among them because, after all, some of them at least understand that they are only building up coast points at the expense of the interior; that they are building up great cities which sooner or later, beyond a doubt, will ship most of their merchandise on the ocean through the Panama Canal. They are building up great cities where they will come in competition with other railroads and must divide the business. No thought or consideration has been given on the part of the railroads to the development of their own territory, over which they have a monopoly.

Mr. President, I have here a short letter from Mr. Kenney, vice president and director of traffic of the Northern Pacific Railroad, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[W. P. KENNEY, vice president and director of traffic]

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO.,
Seattle, Wash., July 26, 1921.

(Personal.)

Mr. EDWARD CHAMBERS,
Vice President, Santa Fe System, Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR MR. CHAMBERS: There is intense feeling regarding request of the railroads for fourth-section relief.

I have been in Spokane and around the coast. There seems to be but little interest on the coast, while in Spokane and other inland cities the merchants are up in arms because they understand the railroads will file the request for fourth-section relief, and my own opinion is that our filing this request for fourth-section relief will alienate all of the intermediate shippers, who, as Mr. McCarthy says, do not care what the rate is so long as they are on equality with their competitors.

If we are ever going to fix up rates, such as you and I discussed, to apply terminal rates at intermediate points as maximum, we should, if we can do so, avoid the necessity for filing an additional fourth-section application at this time, because our filing such application will be to signal for a general attack on our rates by the intermediate States, and I think we had better be prepared to apply every domestic rate as the maximum at intermediate points. If not and we get fourth-section relief we are going to merely build up people that will continually try to break down our rates through water competition while the intermediate jobber, who wants to be friendly and stay with us, will be less able to meet the competition from the coast.

A general attack on our intermediate rates as to their reasonableness, such as the grain rates from Montana, wool rates, livestock rates, etc., that will be precipitated by fourth-section application on our part, will lose us much more than we can gain by any relief we will secure through such application.

I have certainly reached the conclusion that if we buck the intermediate sentiment we will lose much revenue in the interior, much more than we will gain on the coast, and we will finally get an inflexible long-and-short-haul clause that will cause us a great deal of worry and trouble in the future.

Yours very truly,

W. P. KENNEY.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, the letter just read from the desk was secured by the Interstate Commerce Commission or its representatives in its investigation into the propaganda of commercial clubs and great cities and of the railroads themselves to force fourth-section violations upon the country. At this point I conclude my remarks.

Mr. BROOKHART obtained the floor.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator from Maryland desire to proceed at this time?

Mr. BRUCE. I thought the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] had the floor. I had not observed that the Senator from Iowa had taken the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is apparent that there is not a quorum in the Chamber, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Edge	Lodge	Sheppard
Ashurst	Fess	McKellar	Smith
Ball	Frazier	McKinley	Stanfield
Borah	Gooding	McNary	Sterling
Brandegee	Hale	Moses	Swanson
Brookhart	Harris	Neely	Trammell
Broussard	Harrison	Norris	Wadsworth
Bruce	Heflin	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Bursum	Johnson, Calif.	Overman	Warren
Cameron	Johnson, Minn.	Phipps	Wheeler
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Willis
Copeland	Kendrick	Ransdell
Dial	Keyes	Reed, Mo.
Dill	Ladd	Robinson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the proposed amendment has but one object, and that is to prevent a lower charge for a long haul than for a short haul over the same route and in the same direction. Since, under the law, rates must be compensatory, and since these low rates to points competitive with water transportation have been adjudicated to be compensatory, I assume, and shall discuss this proposition from the standpoint, that this amendment means a reduction of rates to intermediate points. It will not be of great value to the farmers unless it does mean a reduction of rates.

The first question to which I shall address myself is, who shall be benefited by this amendment, and who shall be injured, assuming that each, according to his personal interest, will be for it or against it?

I think, in the long run, when every phase of the matter is figured out and fully considered, that there will be nobody against it except those who believe in a monopoly of transportation. Perhaps there was a time when the city of St. Louis believed that the low rates put in by the railroads for the specific purpose of destroying the river traffic would be a good thing for that city. Perhaps some of them, seeing the temporary advantage, took that view; but after the river transportation was destroyed, and the boats had ceased to move, and traffic had practically ended on the river, and the rates were then raised, that sentiment changed.

I know from personal contact with the people of St. Louis recently that at this time they are entirely opposed to any scheme of rate-discrimination that will destroy river traffic; and any temporary advantage that might at one time, and did at one time, accrue to them from that policy of the railroads, is now long since past and gone.

The same argument will apply to the cities on the Atlantic seaboard. Transcontinental rates have been put in, and are proposed now to be put in, for the purpose of destroying the Panama Canal traffic in the same way that the river traffic was destroyed. There might result a temporary advantage to New York and to Norfolk and to Charleston and some of the other cities on the Atlantic seaboard, and to some extent a corresponding benefit to the Pacific seaboard cities; but as soon as the railroads have accomplished their purpose of monopoly in transcontinental traffic and have again raised the rates to those points the temporary advantage will be not only quickly lost but quickly outbalanced by the disadvantages that result from this monopoly.

I therefore assume that each Senator will consider this question in its full aspect; that each Senator will figure it out not as a temporary matter for a local result but as a permanent matter for its national result. Upon that basis I think that every city and every State should favor this equalization of railroad rates, and that every citizen should favor it, unless it be that small group of citizens that are interested in a railroad monopoly of transportation.

A recent report of the Director General of Railroads said that there were some 768,000 people in the United States who owned railroad stocks. If that be true, that is less than three-quarters of 1 per cent of our people who have any direct interest in this railroad monopoly, and many of those in that membership would be loyal to the public interest against any little benefit that might result to them personally.

With this general idea in view and upon the theory that this amendment will reduce the intermediate rates, and that it ought to reduce the intermediate rates, I shall proceed to a discussion of this question. I want to point out some of the larger facts which indicate that not only these rates but all railroad rates ought to be reduced. I want to discuss the big proposition as well as to the specific question relating to the long-and-short-haul proposition.

In the first place, I assert that the railroads can and should reduce their rates because their valuation is not now and never has been the $19,000,000,000 that has been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I want to present a theory of valuation which I think deserves the serious consideration of the Congress of the United States, especially at this time, when agricultural values have been so completely broken down.

These 768,000 people who own the railroads of the United States do not own locomotives. They do not own ties. They do not own steel rails. They do not own coaches. They do not own freight cars. They do not own terminal stations, either freight or passenger. What those people own are certificates of stock; and the only other people in the United States who have a direct interest in the ownership of railroads are the bondholders, and of course they own bonds. These certificates of stock are the property of these people, and they have a value; and I want to say, and put it of record, that the value of those stocks and bonds, the actual properties owned by these people, on any market that has ever been created in the United States, never has exceeded $12,000,000,000; it does not now exceed $12,000,000,000; and I insist that that market value of these securities is the maximum value upon which they are entitled to a return.

I have some authorities upon this question that I desire to present in the record of the Senate. I have here American Railroads of date March 13, 1922. This is a bulletin published by the authority of the Association of Railway Executives, 61 Broadway, New York. This publication, on the date I have mentioned, printed a speech of Mr. C. W. Barron before the Economic Club upon this question of railroad transportation.

Mr. Barron is the owner of the Wall Street Journal, and in that speech Mr. Barron said:

> The railroads of the United States, as you know, have been capitalized at $20,000,000,000. They could not be duplicated for $30,000,000,000. They are selling for $12,000,000,000.

Which means, and which is true, that upon the markets you could buy all the stock and all the bonds representing all the value of all the railroads in all the United States at $12,000,000,000, and the people owning those stocks and bonds would get every cent of value they had in their ownership, and more than they ever actually invested in those stocks and bonds.

In the next place, I wish to quote from Mr. Theodore H. Price, the editor of Finance and Commerce, speaking before the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Nebraska, at Omaha, on February 15, 1923. In discussing this question Mr. Price said:

> Taking up the capital investment first, it may not be generally known that, although the Interstate Commerce Commission has accepted a valuation of $18,900,000,000 for the railroad properties of the country, in construing the provisions of the Esch-Cummins bill the aggregate market value of all the railroad stocks and bonds outstanding is rather less than $12,000,000,000.

These statements are from as high and well-informed financial authority as we have in this country. I myself have made a partial check of this situation. I checked the values of the stocks and bonds of 35 roads, and, taking the market value and the percentage, it is my judgment, too, that this estimate of $12,000,000,000 for the total value of all these properties is high enough.

Is it an unsound theory that we should take that value as a basis of the return upon the railroads? If we do take that value, it means that $7,000,000,000 of water was legalized under the provisions of the transportation act, and that we must pay a return upon that $7,000,000,000 now of 5½ per cent.

Up jumps some financier and says, "It is unsound to take those as a basis of value." If it is unsound, it is for this reason—that it is too high—and that the stock and bond markets have been manipulated. This is the maximum value, then, that would be sound from the standpoint of the people of the United States.

Surely the owners of the railroads can not complain about the market value of their securities as a test for fixing the real valuation of the railroads. They themselves have created that market. They buy and sell those stocks and those bonds upon the market. Therefore they have no argument and no reason for not accepting this as a sound basis of value.

At times that market has been manipulated. At times stocks have been advanced far beyond their value by speculation. Bonds have also been advanced far beyond their value, because I find that the bonds of these railroads are watered as well as stocks. While that is true, and while it would not do for us to take some particular road of which the stock values have been manipulated by speculation and use that as a test, still, as a matter of fact, it has only been a small percentage of this whole volume of stock that has been manipulated at any one time.

That small percentage does not change the grand total of twelve billion very much, and throughout the entire history of the railroads stocks and bonds have, in fact, in their market value been nearer to the actual value of the properties than any other index.

It is said that you can not use that as a test. It is said that a lot of other elements must be considered, and it is also true that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the old, original case of Smyth v. Ames, laid down a rule including several other elements of value. I think it might be well at this time to refresh the record with the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in that leading case. I will read a portion of the opinion of the court, as follows:

> It can not, therefore, be admitted that a railroad corporation maintaining a highway under the authority of the State may fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests, and ignore the rights of the public. But the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad are exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public or the fair value of the services rendered, but in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders.
> If a railroad corporation has bonded its property for an amount that exceeds its fair value, or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization; and the apparent value of the property and franchises used by the corporation, as represented by its stocks, bonds, and obligations, is not alone to be considered when determining the rates that may be reasonably charged. What was said in Covington & L. Turnpike Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578, 596, 597 (41: 560, 566, 567), is pertinent to the question under consideration. It was there observed:
> > "It can not be said that a corporation is entitled, as of right, and without reference to the interests of the public, to realize a given per cent upon its capital stock. When the question arises whether the legislature has exceeded its constitutional power in prescribing rates to be charged by a corporation controlling a public highway, stockholders are not the only persons whose rights or interests are to be considered. The rights of the public are not to be ignored. It is alleged here that the rates prescribed are unreasonable and unjust to the company and its stockholders. But that involves an inquiry as to what is reasonable and just for the public. * * * The public can not properly be subjected to unreasonable rates in order simply that stockholders may earn dividends. The legislature has the authority, in every case where its power has not been restrained by contract, to proceed upon the ground that the public may not rightfully be required to submit to unreasonable executions for the use of a public highway established and maintained under legislative authority."

There is much more general discussion to the same effect, but I will find a part of the opinion, if I may, which points out the specific things which are considered in making up a reasonable rate. I read:

> We hold, however, that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And, in order to ascertain that value, the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. (U. S. Supreme Court Repts., 167–170, Smyth v. Ames, marginal pp. 545, 546, 547.)

Those are the specific elements of the reasonable rate as it must be considered and established by the Interstate Commerce Commission when it is regulating rates for railroads operated by private corporations.

In that method of establishing rates is included the value of the stocks and bonds. However, that is only one of the elements, and these other elements are considered in determining this rate.

Now, however, there is a different theory or policy which I desire to present in connection with this question of valuation. If this valuation can be reduced by $7,000,000,000 legally and rightfully, it is easy to see that not only these intermediate rates but the whole rate structure can be reduced, and this is the proposition.

I think everybody who has studied the railroad question has reached this conclusion, that there must be a combination of these roads into systems, which will end a large part of the competition, especially of the petty competition, which exists at this time. Personally I do not believe in the theory of competition in transportation at all. I believe it is vicious and always works to the disadvantage of the public.

If it be true that these roads should be combined into systems, then the Congress has the right to combine them by condemnation of the stocks and the bonds. If the Interstate Commerce Commission, in fixing this $18,900,000,000 value, has correctly interpreted the law as laid down in Smyth against Ames, then we have two ways of doing it—one by accepting a value of that kind, the other by proceeding directly against the value of the stocks and the bonds.

We do not need to proceed against the bonds; they can be paid when they become due, and there is no necessity of their condemnation; but if we proceed against the stocks, we will take them at their fair market value, which will reduce the whole value of these roads to less than $12,000,000,000. Every owner of stocks in the United States would get every dollar that his property is worth.

I have seen the railroads come through my State. I have seen them take farms for use in railroad construction. They took those farms at their fair market value, and that was all there was to it. The same rule should apply when we must unite the roads into systems to bring about further economy in the transportation system of the people of the United States. If we follow that rule, then we could adopt the amendment and could reduce all the intermediate rates until they fall below the terminal rates which have been established by the exceptions under the law.

I desire to place in the RECORD the holding of the Supreme Court upon the question of the right to condemn stocks and bonds. That has been decided without dissent by a unanimous decision of the Supreme Court. The case is reported in Two hundred and third United States Supreme Court Reports, at page 231, Charles K. Offield, plaintiff in error, v. New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., defendant in error. I shall not take the time to read the opinion, although it is not long. It is by Mr. Justice McKenna. I will read only the latter part of it, as follows:

> (1) The power of the State to declare uses of property to be public has lately been decided in Clark v. Nash (198 U. S. 361; 49 L. ed. 1085; 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676) and in the case of Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Mining Co. (200 U. S. 527; 50 L. ed. 581; 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301). These cases exhibit more striking examples of the power of a State than the case at bar. In the first case the statute of the State permitted an individual to enlarge the ditch of another to obtain water for his own land; in the second case the statute authorized the condemnation of a right of way to transport ore from a mine to a railroad station. In the first case it was said that the public policy of the State, declaring the character of use of property, depends upon the facts surrounding the subject. In the second case it was said, commenting on the first, "it proved that there might be exceptional times and places in which the very foundations of public welfare could not be laid without requiring concessions from individuals to each other upon due compensation, which, under other circumstances, would be left wholly to voluntary consent."
> The case at bar does not need the support of such broad principles. The ultimate purpose of defendant in error in the case at bar is the improvement of the New Haven & Derby Railroad, which "connects (we quote from the opinion of the supreme court of errors, 77 Conn. 419, 59 Atl. 511) at New Haven on the east with four, and at its western terminals with two, important railroad lines owned by the plaintiff (defendant in error) and forms a link in an all-rail route between Boston and the West, which is the only one controlled by the plaintiff, and the only one of any kind controlled by it over which goods can be transported with assured dispatch in all weathers and at all seasons." In this purpose the public has an interest, and to accomplish it the court applied the statute. The court observed: "To develop this route so as best to serve the public interest requires the laying of additional tracks on the New Haven & Derby Railroad and other extensive and very costly improvements. The lessor company has neither means nor credit whereby this can be effected on advantageous terms. The plaintiff could and will effect it, and at much less cost, if it can acquire the two outstanding shares of the stock of the lessee. They are owned by the defendant, who refuses to agree on terms of purchase."

(2) The contract which it is contended was impaired is the lease of the New Haven & Derby Railroad by defendant in error. The lease is for a period of 99 years from July 1, 1892, at a rental of 4 per cent per annum upon the capital stock, together with the payment of taxes, assessments, and interest upon the funded debt. Associated with this contention there is another, more general, to the effect that the statute impairs the contract rights of plaintiff in error as a stockholder of the New Haven & Derby Railroad Co. We do not find it necessary to give precise and separate discussion to these contentions. They seem to us to be but parts or incidents of the contention that the stock is sought for a private use. If they are not incidents of that, they are answered and opposed by the case of Long Island Water Supply Co. v. Brooklyn (166 U. S. 685, 41 L. ed. 1165, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 718). Whatever value the lease gives the shares of stock will be represented in their appraisement.

Therefore, the court not only holds for the power of condemning stocks, but leases or any other form of contract that would interfere with the public interest in this kind of a case. Under that situation the Congress of the United States is now at this point. Shall we consolidate the railroads into systems under a valuation that will place them at about $20,000,000,000, thereby taking into that value all sorts of theories, estimates, and calculations which are not based upon actual investment or upon facts, but based upon the opinions of experts who have opinions without limit; or shall we base that value upon the stocks owned by 768,000 people in the United States and pay them directly what their stocks are worth? If we do that thing, we squeeze $7,000,000,000 of water out of the valuation, and we end the return that must be paid forever upon that valuation. By doing that we would be able not only to adopt this amendment and to reduce the intermediate rates that are higher than the rates in competition with water transportation, but we would be able to reduce the whole rate structure of the United States. We would do no damage and no wrong to any owner of any interest or any right in any railroad whatsoever. We would do exactly what we have done in every condemnation proceeding in all the States and in all the United States for that matter.

The next proposition I desire to discuss is this: If the value be established at $12,000,000,000, what is a reasonable return upon it? I assert that 5¾ per cent is an unreasonable return. It is unreasonably high, and I have some facts and a theory which I desire to present to the Senate which would reduce that return under any fair conditions to something like 3½ or 4 per cent. I base my theory upon the average increase of wealth in the United States, as a result of all labor in the United States, as a result of all earnings of capital in the United States, and as a result of all unearned increment in the United States added together.

The percentage that would represent all of those things would be the maximum that any stabilized capital ought to earn. It is more than the maximum that any stabilized capital should earn, because capital is not entitled to all that the people of the United States can produce. There should be some sort of division when we come to figure the total earnings. I think the theories of figuring out a reasonable return have been based upon the unreasonable returns that have been taken by the power of monopoly in institutions like the Steel Trust and the Oil Trust and the Henry Ford trust and those great combinations that have ruled the matter of profits in our country.

On this question I desire to present to the Senate a recent bulletin of the Department of Commerce, which gives the values of all property in the United States for the years 1912 and 1922. It also goes back to the years 1904, 1900, and previous years. In 1912 the total value of all property in the United States was $186,209,664,000. From those figures, in the next 10 years the value increased to $320,803,862,000. I took the first figures and figured them at 5 per cent, compounding or adding in the interest at the end of each year, because the 5 per cent, if that be the rate, would be added each year. When I got through I found that 5 per cent almost represented the entire advance. A slight fraction over 5 per cent is all the wealth increase that all the people and all the capital and all the property advance in the United States are able to produce in a period of 10 years.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator give that 10-year period again? I have forgotten the date.

Mr. BROOKHART. From 1912 to 1922. If Senators desire to figure other periods, I will give the figures for 1904 and 1900 because the rate does not change very materially over any of the periods. The figures for 1904 are $107,104,194,000 and for 1900 the figures are $88,517,307,000.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a period of only four years.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but it only figures between 5 and 6 per cent anywhere along the line, as I recollect it.

This is a great economic fact that has received but little consideration in framing the laws that should govern our economic institutions in the United States. Profits are allowed to run wild, and the profits that go highest and wildest are those that are controlled by business that is the most stable. Stable business certainly has no right to a profit above the average earnings of all the people and of all properties. There may be some other lines of business that are a greater risk that would be entitled to some consideration upon that theory, but the whole proposition is that all of the earnings of the people are entitled to more weight in figuring up a reasonable return than is any other consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In the totals which he is stating, does he include the so-called "unearned increment"?

Mr. BROOKHART. Absolutely; and that ought not to be included in a railroad valuation. I will discuss that in a moment.

Furthermore, while these figures show only a 5 per cent increase in property in all the United States year by year, here is the comment of the Secretary of Commerce upon these figures:

> It should be borne in mind that the increases in money value are, to a large extent, due to the rise in prices which has taken place in recent years, and so far as that is the case they do not represent corresponding increases in the quantity of wealth.

Therefore, the actual wealth or property increases have probably been much less than the 5 per cent which is figured out in this case.

Under that situation, what is a fair return upon a railroad property, which is one of the best stabilized properties now in the United States under the present transportation act? It is stabilized by a command in the law directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to levy rates upon the people of the United States high enough to yield the railroads a return of 5¾ per cent on their adjudged value. Five and three-fourths per cent is an unreasonable return upon their property. There are $10,000,000,000 of bonds now in that valuation that are only yielding about 4½ per cent; and nobody has ever explained to me or given to me a reason why there should be an extra return of $150,000,000, a bonus, as it were, upon that bonded portion of this capital.

What about the "unearned increment"? Should it be added to railroad valuation in any case? It is said that a farmer has a right to the advance in the value of his farm, and, therefore, it is asked, why should not a railroad have the right to the advance in the value of its property; but is that a fair comparison? What is the difference in the comparison? The farmer has no law and no board that fixes prices for his products high enough so that he can collect operating expenses, all taxes, and all depreciation, and then have a return of 5¾ per cent in addition upon the full value of his farm, and 50 per cent of water added.

There is no such law surrounding any business except the business of the public utility, but the public utility has that law, as decided in the Smyth-Ames case, which I have just read. Even before the enactment of the transportation act the public utility had the right under the common law and under the Constitution to a reasonable return, which was, in effect, a guaranteed return. It had the right to levy rates high enough to yield such a return and to compel the public to pay those rates. Since the farmer and other business have no such law and no such right, there is a different situation as to "unearned increment" presented when it relates to public utilities and when it relates to private business.

I maintain that the public utility has no right to a law that will give it a guaranteed return; then, in addition, charge up and add to its capitalization a speculative increase in the value of its property; and then charge the public which created that increase rates high enough to get a return upon that speculative value. So far as railroads are concerned, there is no justice in the capitalization of "unearned increment." Perhaps we can not correct what has happened in the past, though to some extent we can by the condemnation of the stocks and bonds; but two or three billion dollars' worth of those stocks and bonds would have no value in them at all to-day had not the "unearned increment" in the real-estate values grown up under them and given them a value.

Some say if this method of condemning the stocks and bonds were adopted it would mean Government ownership of the railroads. What if it did? Government operation during the war was a good deal cheaper than the operation which followed after the railroads were turned back. The McAdoo management of the railroads, which I have always condemned, was nearly a billion and a half dollars cheaper than the private management which immediately followed it. I desire to put the figures in the RECORD at this point. I quote from Statistics of Railways for the year 1919, which was the last year of Government operation of the railroads and within two months of the end of Government operation. I find on page 50 of that report that the total operating expense of all three classes of roads for that year was $4,569,029,750. Two months later the roads were turned back to the so-called efficient private ownership, and for the next 10 months of that year they were operated under private ownership. What happened to the operating expenses in that time? Did they decrease under the efficiency of private ownership? Did it cost the people of the United States less to operate the roads? Here we have a comparison for two years, the best two years for the purpose of comparison in the history of the railroads, for during those two years traffic and other conditions were more nearly equal than in almost any other two years that can be mentioned. How much were the operating expenses reduced under the so-called efficiency of private management? Here are the figures. The Statistics of Railways for the year 1920, to December 31 of that year, on page 43, show that the total operating expenses for that year were $6,054,033,684. Senators can subtract those two amounts for themselves and see that, instead of the operating expenses decreasing under this efficient private management, they increased $1,485,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I was called out of the Chamber for a moment and I lost to some extent the connection, but, as I gather, the last figures the Senator has quoted represent the operating expenses under private management for only 10 months?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; for only 10 months.

Mr. NORRIS. While the other figures the Senator read just previously as to operation under Government control represented 10 or 12 months?

Mr. BROOKHART. Twelve months. The figures I have given were for the whole 12 months in each case, but 2 months of the 12 in the last figures were under Government operation, being the months of January and February. If the roads had been in private management throughout the whole period of the 12 months the showing would have been worse.

During 6 months of those 10 there was a Government guaranty, which was paid out of the Treasury of the United States. The law guaranteed the roads this return during that time. I asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for a statement of how much was paid out to make up these expenses, and I have the statement here, dated May 12, 1924. The total is $505,857,512.70, and it is estimated that the balance due under the section is $30,142,487.30. Those two items added together make exactly $536,000,000, representing funds paid to the railroads by the Government of the United States. Yet when the Agricultural Committee tries to obtain a little appropriation of $200,000,000 to assist agriculture in its present distressed condition, those who advocate that plan are denounced as an outfit of socialists and anarchists and bolshevists. No one denounced in those terms the men who advocated taking $536,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States to guarantee to the railroads a return of 6 per cent upon a fictitious valuation, $7,000,000,000 of which was watered.

That is not all the Government has done for the railroads. While we are upon the question of paternalism I wish to point out that paternalism and socialism and anarchism and all the other isms which the representatives of the farmers and the common people are accused of advocating are very reasonable things when they are advocated by a lot of Wall Street anarchists.

In addition to the cash amount paid to the railroads under the law the Interstate Commerce Commission was authorized to take out of the Treasury $350,000,657 of loans to the railroads. These gigantic amounts of Government aid have been granted to the railroads at different times, although their total real valuation is only $12,000,000,000. In addition to that there is held uncertified nearly $100,000,000 more for the purpose of such loans. The secretary of the commission gives me the figures as $97,335,425.

Mr. NORRIS. What is that item, I should like to ask the Senator? I wish he would explain that item.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is loans under the revolving fund. It is headed:

The following statement shows, as of April 30, the status of the revolving fund of $300,000,000 created by section 210 of the transportation act.

So right now we have that system of paternalism in operation to take care of the railroads and to protect the profits of the owners of railroad stocks—not only three-quarters of 1 per cent above the average earnings of all the people of the United States and of all the property of the country, but upon a valuation that is $7,000,000,000 or $8,000,000,000 higher than you could purchase the property for right now in the markets of the United States.

That is not quite all that we have done under our system for transportation in our history. I want to mention at least one other matter of paternalism that has been done by the Government for the railroads of the United States, and that is the land grants to the railroads.

I notice that this document went out of print suddenly. I had a hard time to find it, but I finally got a copy of it. It was printed first in 1915. It is entitled:

Statement showing land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, wagon roads, and so forth, together with data relative thereto.

It was prepared by the Department of the Interior, by A. A. JONES, First Assistant Secretary.

Mr. WARREN. That is the senior Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BROOKHART. Our Senator JONES?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is our Senator JONES.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then there is not any doubt but that it is right.

Mr. NORRIS. At least, nobody here would dare dispute it.

Mr. BROOKHART. No.

Then what do we find? We find that there has been given to the railroads in land grants 158,293,376.84 acres. That is more than 4½ times the size of the State of Iowa; and one-fifth of the State of Iowa was given away in those grants.

The present value of that land is far more than the total value of all the railroads in the United States, and at the value at which they held it then it was more than the amount of money that they put into the railroads of the United States.

I was up in New York not long ago. I was talking to a crowd of those financiers who juggle the railroads for their own private profit, and after I had finished talking there was a series of questions. One of those chaps stood up and said to me: "You are unfair to the railroads." He said: "I was out in your State when land was worth $5 an acre."

Mr. WARREN. I was there when it was worth $2.50 an acre.

Mr. BROOKHART. He said: "We built a railroad along beside that land, and it became worth $150 an acre." Then I said to him, "Yes; Iowa is the best agricultural spot in this big, round world. It produces one-tenth of all the foodstuffs in all the United States. There is not another spot of ground on this earth as large as Iowa, as near square as Iowa, with as little waste land and as rich soil and as great production as the State of Iowa; and we gave one-fifth of that princely domain to the railroads. Not only that, but we voted taxes upon towns and upon townships, and we voted bonds on counties, and we built those roads, and after we built them you owned them back here in New York."

In spite of all that the Government and the people of the United States have done for transportation——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator before he leaves the subject of giving lands to the railroads?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does this document to which the Senator has referred give the number of acres by States and localities?

Mr. BROOKHART. It does by railroads and in detail as the grants are made.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to interfere with the outline of the Senator's remarks, but I think it would be interesting if he would give us some of those details. For instance, how much land was given to the Union Pacific, and how much of that was in the State of Nebraska, and how much in Colorado?

Mr. BROOKHART. I doubt whether it is divided by States, because the grants, I think, were not made by States.

As to the main line of the Union Pacific, I find this:

STATEMENT SHOWING LAND GRANTS MADE BY CONGRESS TO AID IN THE CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROADS, WAGON ROADS, CANALS, AND INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, TOGETHER WITH DATA RELATIVE THERETO, COMPILED FROM THE RECORDS OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Date of grant.—July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. p. 489).

Route of road.—From a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Republican River and the north margin of the valley of the Platte River, in the Territory of Nebraska, to the western boundary of Nevada Territory; also from a point on western boundary of Iowa to the one hundredth meridian aforesaid.

Extent of grant in place.—Odd sections within 10 miles on each side of road.

Extent of indemnity limits.—No indemnity.

Grantee.—Union Pacific Railroad Co.

Subdivisions of grant and present owners.—No subdivision. Union Pacific Railroad Co.

Additional legislation affecting but not increasing grant—

July 3, 1866 (14 Stat. p. 79). Authorized company to locate and construct its road from Omaha westward by the best and most practicable route without reference to the initial point on the one hundredth meridian previously provided by law.

July 26, 1866 (14 Stat. p. 367). Grants right of way through military reservation and authorizes the President to set apart lands for depot purposes.

April 10, 1869 (16 Stat. p. 56). Provides for the protection of the interests of the United States in the Union Pacific Railroad Co. for a common terminus of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific roads at or near Ogden.

May 6, 1870 (16 Stat. p. 21). Fixes the point of junction of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Cos.

June 20, 1874 (18 Stat. p. 111). Amends section 15, act of July 2, 1864, and provides for a penalty for a refusal of the company or any officer or agent thereof to use and operate the Pacific railroads as a continuous line and a mode of enforcing said penalty.

May 7, 1878 (20 Stat. p. 56). Provides for a sinking fund, etc.

June 24, 1912 (37 Stat. p. 138). Legalizing conveyances of rights of way.

Date of definite location—

First 100 miles west of Omaha, October 24, 1864. Date of withdrawal: December 16, 1863; December 22, 1863; December 16, 1864; and December 19, 1864.

First 100 miles west of Omaha, November 4, 1864.

One hundred miles west of Omaha to Sale Lake, June 25, 1865. Date of withdrawal: December 18, 1867, and December 28, 1867.

Second 100 miles west of Omaha, January 19, 1866. Date of withdrawal: February 6, 1866.

Second 100 miles west of Omaha, June 29, 1866. Date of withdrawal: August 21, 1866.

Third 100 miles west of Omaha, July 23, 1866. Date of withdrawal: None.

Third 100 miles west of Omaha, March 30, 1867. Date of withdrawal: June 26, 1867, and April 21, 1871.

Fourth 100 miles west of Omaha, March 14, 1867. Date of withdrawal: June 26, 1867.

Fourth 100 miles west of Omaha, January 6, 1868. Date of withdrawal: November 6, 1869; December 21, 1870; April 21, 1871; and November 8, 1873.

Fifth 100 miles west of Omaha, January 6, 1868. Date of withdrawal: November 6, 1869; December 21, 1870; November 8, 1873; August 9, 1870; April 17, 1871; and May 11, 1872.

Sixth 100 miles west of Omaha, January 6, 1868. Date of withdrawal: November 6, 1879; November 8, 1873; August 9, 1870; April 17, 1871; and May 11, 1872.

Seventh 100 miles west of Omaha, July 2, 1868. Date of withdrawal: August 9, 1870, and April 17, 1871.

Eighth 100 miles west of Omaha, October 21, 1868. Date of withdrawal: August 9, 1870, and April 17, 1871.

Ninth 100 miles west of Omaha, October 21, 1868. Date of withdrawal: August 9, 1870, and April 17, 1871.

Tenth 100 miles west of Omaha, April 28, 1869. Date of withdrawal: August 9, 1870; April 17, 1871; May 15, 1869; April 6, 1870; April 22, 1872; and October 16, 1873.

Eleventh 100 miles west of Omaha, April 28, 1869. Date of withdrawal: August 9, 1870; April 17, 1871; May 15, 1869; April 6, 1870; April 22, 1872; and October 16, 1873.

Date of restoration of indemnity lands—No right of indemnity.

Condition of grant—Not adjusted.

Estimated area of grant, in acres—12,119,671.63.

Number of acres certified or patented to June 30, 1914—11,933,776.09.

Length of road, in miles—1,038.68.

Miles of road completed within time prescribed—1,038.68.

Miles of road completed after time prescribed—None.

Miles of road uncompleted at date entire road should have been completed—None.

Miles of road uncompleted September 29, 1890—None.

Remarks—Extends from the Missouri River at Omaha, Nebr., to a junction with the Central Pacific Railroad in the northwest quarter of northeast quarter section 1, township 6 north, range 2 west, Utah, 5.11 miles north of the town of Ogden. See act of May 6, 1870. The Central Pacific Railroad Co., however, leases and operates the road between the point of junction and Ogden, 5.11 miles, the running connections being made at the latter point. Company received bonds for 1,038.68 miles.

Date of grant—July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. p. 356).

Route of road—From a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, between the south margin of the valley of the Republican River and the north margin of the valley of the Platte River, in the Territory of Nebraska, to the western boundary of Nevada Territory; also from a point on western boundary of Iowa to the one hundredth meridian aforesaid.

Extent of grant in place—Odd sections within 20 miles on each side of road.

Extent of indemnity limits—No indemnity.

Grantee—Union Pacific Railroad Co.

And here is the total:

Estimated area of grant in acres, 12,119,671.63.

Number of acres certified or patented to June 30, 1914, 11,993,776.09.

I will say to the Senator that I have some recent information, which I have not yet checked, that the Union Pacific now owns, as a result of that grant, lands and natural resources that are worth more than its road, and is carrying them on its books at the original valuation to avoid taxation.

Mr. President, I think there has been no economic policy in the history of the world that has gone so far from the rights of the people as our economic policy with reference to transportation. It has been said that this system gave us railroads speedily, and a speedy development of the country. I deny that conclusion. I want to say that this system has retarded the development of the country just exactly as the cost-plus contracts retarded the building of the cantonments during the war. If we had gone about this matter in a proper way and handled it in the interest of the public, instead of turning it over into the hands of a few great financiers who were reaching out for their own personal profit, the results would have been speedy, and they would have been much better for the development of the whole country, and in addition this discrimination in rates, at which the amendment under consideration strikes, never would have been developed.

It has been said that this system of building our railroads gave us lower rates. I have read in newspapers hundreds of times that American freight rates were the lowest in the world.

I want to place the statement in the RECORD, and I stand ready to demonstrate it beyond possible denial that American freight rates have been the highest in the world for the same service.

A freight rate is made up of two elements. One is the terminal expense of loading and unloading. The other is the movement. In the United States that is divided about half and half. The terminal expense costs about as much as does the movement on the road. The average haul in the United States, as I find from consulting the 1921 table, was 304 miles. That is the longest average haul in the world, unless it be in Canada. Taking that longer haul and comparing it with the shorter hauls of other countries, they were able to get a per-ton-mile rate for the United States that was lower than in other countries. The average haul in Germany before the war was 68 miles, so that there was nearly five times as much terminal in the German haul as there was in the American haul, and yet by comparing them as though the service were the same they reached the conclusion that the American rate of about three-quarters of a cent per ton-mile was lower than the German rate of one and a quarter cents per ton-mile. Then I took their rules for figuring terminal expenses, and I figured out the terminal expense per ton in the United States, and I found that the terminal expense alone was more than the whole German rate, terminal movement and all. So that under this sort of a juggling of figures we have proceeded under the theory that we have the best service and the best rates, when in fact we have no such thing. We were charged the highest rate, and in comparison our service was not equal, when the propositions were properly compared.

Most of this does not bear directly on the proposition in issue before the Senate at this time, but indirectly it has an important bearing, because we have reached the time when we must consider all of these questions with reference to the whole economic problem, and when we consider it in that way we must have all of the big facts upon which this economic situation is justly based. We must take into consideration the relative situation of agriculture and of other business and of transportation.

Agriculture is the greatest business in the United States. The property value of agriculture, under the 1920 census, was over $78,000,000,000. Since then the deflation has reduced it. It has gone down perhaps to $60,000,000,000, but while agriculture has been deflated the artificial value put upon the railroads continues. It has not been deflated one cent, and the added investments have been added to it, so that the present value exceeds the value at first fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The railroads have been sustained by this paternalistic law, which maintains their value for them whether times are good or bad. The value of the Steel Trust properties and of the Oil Trust properties have been maintained because the Government of the United States, through a paternalistic tariff, has permitted them to establish prices for their products which maintain their profits regardless of what may be the condition of agriculture or of other lines of business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is there a tariff on petroleum?

Mr. BROOKHART. I could not answer the Senator's question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My attention was directed to the assertion of the Senator that the oil companies' values are sustained by a tariff.

Mr. NORRIS. The Steel Trust, he said.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator referred to the oil companies.

Mr. BROOKHART. I may have included the oil companies, and there may be some tariff on some of the oil products. I think there is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If so, I would like to have my attention called to it.

Mr. BROOKHART. At any rate, I know in some instances the combinations may not need a tariff. The situation as to location and everything else may be such that they can organize their combinations and levy their profits upon the people of the United States regardless of whether they are right or wrong.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does not the tariff apply to farmers just as it does to the others?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; it does not apply to farmers, because the situation is different. The farmer is not enabled by the tariff to fix his price at Pittsburgh, plus freight, as the Steel Trust does, and he never has been able to.

Mr. FESS. How does the manufacturer fix his price through the tariff in any different way from what the farmer can fix his price with the same tariff in operation?

Mr. BROOKHART. Is the Senator familiar with the Steel Trust cost-plus system of fixing prices at Pittsburgh?

Mr. FESS. No; the Senator is not.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will tell him about it, then. When the Steel Trust wants to fix the price, it figures up what it will charge at Pittsburgh. It does not ask anybody what the price is in Liverpool, or in London, or in Hamburg, or any place else. It figures it out at Pittsburgh. For 15 years before the war the Steel Trust put a price on steel rails at $28 a ton. There was an $8 tariff on rails. If you bought rails at Gary, Ind., or Pueblo, Colo., or anywhere else, they added the freight from Pittsburgh to the point where those rails were made, although the rails were not shipped from Pittsburgh at all.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the Pittsburgh plus theory. I yield.

Mr. FESS. What do the independent steel manufacturers do, those who handle a little more than 50 per cent of the steel production of the United States?

Mr. BROOKHART. They trail right along after the trust, and if they did not, they would be smashed. They do not dare do otherwise.

Mr. FESS. In other words, one fixes the price for all?

Mr. BROOKHART. Practically so. That is the practical result. I checked up those prices for five years on rails—and those rails are paid for largely by farmers in freight rates—and at the time I priced steel rails in Canada, at Winnipeg, they paid more than a thousand miles of freight and sold the rails at $20 a ton in Winnipeg. I checked the prices in Europe, and found that the manufacturers paid the freight across the ocean and sold the rails at $20 a ton.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Pittsburgh plus system does not apply merely to rails. It applies to all steel products.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. And that same system applies to building material. Just to illustrate, let us say that a manufacturer in Chicago sells rails to a builder in Omaha; the price of those rails includes the freight charge from Pittsburgh to Chicago, although as a matter of fact, they never saw Pittsburgh and never were east of Chicago. There is no question about that. It is a question as to which the Federal Trade Commission made complaint against the steel people, and issued an order against them, stating that it was an unfair practice. That is in court now, under an injunction pending against the Federal Trade Commission, to prohibit them with going on with the case.

Mr. BROOKHART. The tariff enabled them to do that. Without the tariff they could not have done that with steel.

Colonel Rumsey, of St. Louis, Mo., who is heavily interested in mining, told me that he bought his steel supplies for his mines in Mexico for prices 20 per cent lower, on an average, than he bought them in the United States, buying them from the same company.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Was that steel of the same style, or of a different style, which is sold at a cheaper rate in the foreign market?

Mr. BROOKHART. It was the same thing in every respect.

Mr. NORRIS. It might have been a different style, but it was sold by the ton. If it was a lighter rail it did not cost so much, of course, but it was sold by the ton.

Mr. FESS. It is a very common thing for American manufacturers to sell a style abroad that is different from what we use here. For example, the locomotives that were supplied to Russia by our country were not the same locomotives we use here, and therefore they could be sold at lower prices.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the steel bars which Colonel Rumsey bought for his mines were the same as those he bought in this country, and described them to me as exactly the same articles. He said all kinds of such articles cost him in Mexico an average of 20 per cent less.

The farmer has no rights under the tariff. He has no possibility of doing those things. His price is fixed at Liverpool by the markets of the world; and I want to say right now that the protective system is on trial. I say that the farmers of the United States are going to have some arrangement so that their prices will be fixed at cost of production plus a reasonable profit, or something will happen to the tariff system in the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, does not the Senator believe that the price of a farm product, the same as the price of any other product is determined, not by the fixing of a price, but by the demand and the ability to meet the demand?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not believe demand has anything to do with any protected industry's price in the United States, I believe it is fixed by the tariff and by combinations behind the tariff.

Mr. FESS. Then why does it not apply to the farmer?

Mr. BROOKHART. Because the farmer's price is fixed by the surplus which he must sell abroad.

Mr. FESS. Why is the manufacturer's price not fixed by the surplus?

Mr. BROOKHART. Because they do not care. The surplus is a small amount, and they have control of it. Our surplus is not under our control. It is under the control of certain trusts and exporters.

Mr. FESS. I fear the Senator's view is going to increase the surplus, and his remedy is going to be worse than the disease.

Mr. BROOKHART. There is always some economic theory by which you try to get around doing anything for the farmer if you can; but you are not going to get around it this year and get away with it. Something is going to happen unless they get, not a promise of relief, but a law which will relieve the farmers in this situation.

Mr. FESS. I fear that if the Senator has his way something will happen to the farmers.

Mr. BROOKHART. Something has happened to them under the Senator's way of doing business down here, and that is bankruptcy. That is what the Senator's system has done for them.

Mr. FESS. Is the decrease in the production of wheat from 9 bushels per acre to 6 bushels per acre in the Northwest due to the tariff, or due to the Government, or due to anything we do here?

Mr. BROOKHART. It is due to several different things. It has nothing to do with the point we are discussing.

Mr. FESS. I think it has very much to do with it. We are talking about inadequate freight rates.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator is in favor of the protective tariff for industrial enterprises in the United States, is he not?

Mr. FESS. I am in favor of the protective tariff to the degree of making up the difference in the cost of labor here and in the country with which we compete.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator always puts it on the basis of labor, and takes it on the basis of profit. Is that right?

Mr. FESS. The profit goes to labor; certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. The profit as I figure it out does not go to labor.

Mr. FESS. The Senator figures it out wrong.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me give the Senator the figures. I have the figures on profits.

Mr. FESS. Suppose we had no tariff upon an article which is imported from Germany to-day; with Germany working at the inflated price of the mark for about one-fifteenth of what our American workmen work for, what would be the effect?

Mr. BROOKHART. The effect would be that the Germans would destroy our industrial institutions.

Mr. FESS. Precisely; that is right.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have been a protectionist all my life, but I have not been a protectionist for the Steel Trust as a specialty. I am not a protectionist on the theory that we will protect a few and let the many suffer, and that is the situation in which we find ourselves now.

Mr. FESS. The Senator and I agree on that, that we are not protectionists for any special interest. The Steel Trust, as a matter of fact, has less protection than most of the industries of the country. In fact, the tariff has been reduced on steel products for the last 30 years, as the Senator knows.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but it was too high at the beginning and too high at the end.

Mr. FESS. The Senator would say that the oil industry is one of the greatest trusts. There is no tariff upon oil.

Mr. BROOKHART. On oil products?

Mr. FESS. Some products——

Mr. BROOKHART. I thought so.

Mr. FESS. As to some products in which labor is involved, there is a tariff to protect labor.

Mr. BROOKHART. We will see about labor in a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the theory of the protective tariff does not imply that some industries ought to have any tariff at all. The thorough protectionist, as I conceive him to be, believes that articles which we can manufacture better and cheaper than they can be made anywhere else on earth ought to be on the free list. A protectionist does not necessarily demand a tariff on everything. Where we are producing and exporting an article to the balance of the world, and selling it in competition with the balance of the world, no protectionist would ask that a tariff be placed on such an article, no matter what it might be.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, does the Senator say that we would need to have protection on an article that could be produced to the point of exporting it?

Mr. NORRIS. I thought I made myself clear. It is true there might be an instance here and there where temporarily we would export, even in cases where we ought to have a tariff. I concede that; but I am speaking now of a general rule——

Mr. FESS. I agree with the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. A general proposition. As I conceive protection, we ought to have no tariff on things in which we can under ordinary, reasonable, fair conditions compete with the entire world, and which we can send all over the world and sell all over the world.

Mr. FESS. Not if we can do it without the protection; but if we have an industry like the refining of sugar, for instance, as to which under proper protection we could ultimately become an exporting country, the tariff should not be taken off because we have reached the point where we can export, because as soon as we did that the competition with the old country would put us back where we were before, unless we reduced the recompense of our labor.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is a good deal in what the Senator said, but, again, the protectionist does not believe in putting a tariff on things that we can not produce here unless he does it purely for revenue—for instance, on coffee. We would agree on that.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. There might be articles—and sugar might be one of them—where there would be an honest disagreement as to whether we were prepared and qualified to produce them to the limit of our consumption. The Senator has given an instance where I think there might be an honest disagreement. If we can produce the sugar and do not have to make the tariff too high to do it, and can develop it, we ought to do it. We could produce bananas in this country if we made the tariff high enough and grew them in glass houses, but no protectionist would stand for a scheme of that kind. Under ordinary natural conditions can we do it?

Mr. FESS. I used the sugar illustration because a former Secretary of Agriculture said we had 278,000,000 acres of ground in this country that is sugar land, and I presume with that acreage we could produce all the sugar we need and supply a good portion of the world demand. I think the Senator from Nebraska and I are agreed on the fundamental statement of the principle that he mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. BROOKHART. But I am not agreed to the proposition that we are entitled to set up a protective tariff system that will enable any line of capital in the United States to earn more in the way of dividends and profits than the people of the United States can produce. That is the basis from which I start. I pointed out—I do not know whether the Senator from Ohio was present or not—that 5 per cent a year in the last 10 years represented all the wealth increase of all the brains and all the muscle and all the capital and all the everything else that contributes to property increase.

Mr. FESS. I do not think I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think we have gone wild in having a corporation system that has enabled them to levy and to charge profits upon us, charging them as a tax, a tax without representation, just as surely as was the tax on tea that sent us into the Revolutionary War.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator mean we ought not to stimulate, through a protective tariff, an industry to the point where we go beyond supplying our own needs and can supply other portions of the world?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not mean any such thing, but I mean that the profits on that business should not be turned to a few men at a rate in excess of what the people of the country can produce in profits. That is special privilege. I want to say to you that if all the increase from all the wealth and all the unearned increment only amounts to 5 per cent a year, then capital is not entitled to 5 per cent. When the banks charge 7 and 8 and 10 per cent upon money loaned they are not entitled to charge it. They are taking more than they are entitled to in this economic situation. When the Steel Trust and the Oil Trust and these other fellows who are combined in the trusts of the country take these gigantic profits and these enormous stock dividends which they are taking, and to which they are not entitled, they are taking them out of the sweat and labor of the farmers and the common people of the United States. When the railroads under this law are able to charge 5½ per cent upon a valuation, and that valuation has $7,000,000,000 of water in it over and above what we could buy all the stocks and all the bonds for, representing all the value at this moment, then I say to you that such an economic situation can not continue. That is what is the matter in the country.

Mr. FESS. Oh, the Senator does not mean that all the stocks that are issued in an industry are to measure all the value of that industry, does he?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I certainly do not, nor in the case of the railroads.

Mr. FESS. In other words, the stocks and bonds of the railroads do not represent what the railroads are worth. Does the Senator mean that?

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator had been in the Chamber during my discussion of the matter, he would have found out what I mean. No; I do not mean that. I said the stocks represented mostly water and they do not represent value at all. I referred to the total value of the railroads. I fix that total value because we could buy all the stocks and bonds right now for less than $12,000,000,000 if we got them at present market value.

Mr. FESS. I am as much interested in the reduction of freight rates as is the Senator from Iowa. As a member of the committee I have been studying the problem very carefully. How is the Senator going to reduce the income of the railroads if he does not reduce the cost of operation? In reducing the cost of operation, how much of the tax is he going to take off? How much of labor is he going to reduce? How much of operating expenses is he going to take off? Where is he going to take it all off?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am going to take $7,000,000,000 of water out of the value to start on, and there is $400,000,000 of revenue to start with. In the next place I am going to stop the capitalization of some $300,000,000 of unearned increment that no public utility should have any right to capitalize. In the next place I am going to stop the return on the bonded portion of the capital over and above the interest rates on the bonds, which now on $10,000,000,000 is less than 4½ per cent. In the next place I am going to stop the graft of the subsidiary companies that are making all the supplies for the railroads, which amounts to $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 a year. With those items I am going to reduce freight rates in the country by more than $1,000,000,000 without reducing the wages of any man that works.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has made a statement I do not understand. I do not know whether other Senators understand it or not. I am asking how he is going to reduce the cost of operation, and he says he is going to take $7,000,000,000 of water out of the stock.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; and that takes $400,000,000 out of operation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But it has nothing to do with operation. The Senator is speaking of cost of operation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under this law they get 5¾ per cent upon the valuation, and I am going to reduce that valuation until the return we must pay on it will be $400,000,000 less a year.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has made a statement. Will he indicate by the ledger that marks the amount of money he takes in and the amount he pays out, wherein he is cutting?

Mr. BROOKHART. I have just figured out a billion dollars of it and over, by ledger or any other way the Senator wants to figure. If the Senator can not add $400,000,000 on capital and $300,000,000 on unearned increment and $150,000,000 of excess return on the bonded portion of the capital, and then $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 graft in the furnishing of supplies, and take all of those out of the costs, all of which are added in operating expenses now, I can not help him to understand the situation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Operating expenses?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Dividends are not a part of operating expenses. I beg the Senator to think that over a moment.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do think it over, and I know what I am talking about. Under this law we are required to pay 5¾ per cent, and that is operating expense.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no. That is the limitation. That is not a guaranty.

Mr. FESS. That is merely the maximum. It is not a guaranty.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator said it is not a guaranty, and yet the law commands the Interstate Commerce Commission to levy rates upon me and upon the farmers and the people of the country high enough to yield that return upon a valuation which is, as fixed in the beginning, $18,900,000,000.

Mr. FESS. If it commands it, why has it not been done?

Mr. BROOKHART. There is a power sometimes even beyond the czar, and when they deflated the farmers so that they did not have the money to pay it they could not collect it, but they have collected every dollar they could. If prosperity should return so they could collect it, they would collect every dollar of it now.

Mr. FESS. It is simply a matter of permission to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the commission has never exercised it.

Mr. BROOKHART. The commission had it all in its power. It raised the rates until it destroyed agriculture or contributed largely to the destruction of agriculture. It raised them to a point beyond which they found out the returns were declining, and then they quit raising them. The people did not have the money to pay them.

Mr. President, in view of the questions by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], I am going to put into the RECORD some figures in relation to the profits of the manufacturing industries and of the wages of labor. I have before me the bulletin of the Department of Commerce on manufactures for the year 1919. On page 3 of that publication, I find that in that year there was capital employed in manufactures amounting to approximately forty-four and one half billion dollars; that the wage earners employed averaged 9,096,372; that they received in wages ten and a half billion dollars, approximately, which means approximately $1,100 each. In the year of the highest wages and the high tide of prosperity in the United States, I find that the total value of manufactured products was nearly sixty-two and a half billion dollars. I find that that value was increased by manufacture over $25,000,000,000. Subtracting the wages of workers, the salaries of the officers, the rent, the taxes, the fuel, the power, and other items, I find that there was left $9,324,000,000, or 21 per cent upon that whole amount of nearly forty-four and one-half billion dollars invested.

During the same year the farmers, with a valuation of $78,000,000,000, only had a gross value in their production of about $14,000,000,000. They had a less percentage of earnings for all their work and the work of their families and children and hired men than any other industry. There never has been a time when profits have been proportioned rightly. There never has been a time when those who were in the big combinations were not able to make excessive charges upon the other people of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit an inquiry at that point? I desire to ask a question for information.

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. The statement has often been made that the Railroad Administration under the management of Mr. McAdoo raised the wages of the employees of the railroads to altitudinous heights entirely disproportionate to the wages which were paid in other lines of industry. I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the wage increase then made was on an average less than 25 per cent, that there have been two increases in wages since Mr. McAdoo's administration, and that even now the wages of the railroad employees in many departments are much lower than in other lines of industry?

Mr. BROOKHART. As I recollect the percentages, the wages of railroad labor were raised less than were wages generally. I recollect one raise in wages after Mr. McAdoo retired from the management of the railroads. Then, of course, there has been a big reduction in wages, I think to the extent of about $552,000,000 or something like that, since the railroads were turned back to their owners. Considering the risk of the employees, and all of the matters connected with the railroad service, railroad wages are not substantially higher than are any other wages in the country even at this time.

Mr. President, in reference to this situation, I desire to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Des Moines Register of last Sunday. It covers the question of the returns to the farmers, to the railroads, to the banks, and to business generally in a very fair-minded way. It points out the disjointed situation as to agriculture and the reasons why it is time for the industrial world to wake up and see that agriculture shall join in the partnership of prosperity. I think, Mr. President, that the prosperity of which we read so much can not much longer continue, with agriculture in the depressed condition in which it is at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

[From Des Moines Sunday Register, Sunday, May 11, 1924]

WHY NOT FACE IT?

The Register republishes this morning on this page a most interesting showing of America's enormous financial gains out of the war.

From paying interest abroad before the war of $300,000,000 a year we have now coming from abroad about $700,000,000 a year, a net change of $1,000,000,000 a year.

Even with all our travel abroad and with all our purchases abroad the net balance is in our favor. We are receiving more than we are spending. The gold is still being shipped to us to meet balances.

And yet at this very time, with this enormous shift of the world's wealth to America, farms are being foreclosed all over the West, banks heavily loaned to farming are in distress, renters are walking off their farms without a dollar, and hundreds of thousands are flocking to the industrial centers to earn day wages.

How does it happen that just when America is becoming the wealthiest nation of the world an occupation that concerns one-third of our people and furnishes our basic supplies is, figuratively speaking, on the rocks, with nobody suggesting a way out that promises any sort of equalizing of benefits, or if somebody is suggesting an equalizing of benefits the suggestion is immediately hailed as a violation of the "economic law" and of "the law of supply and demand"?

On the face of it there is something wrong with the organization of the industrial community when a nation that gains so rapidly in wealth finds one-third of its people, in its most basic employment, not only not holding their own but actually losing out.

There is no "economic law" and no "law of supply and demand" to account for any such disproportion of benefits. For if the mere laws of nature were alone at work manifestly no such disproportion could come. It is the organization of society, the stabilization of industries, the control of markets, of banking, of railroading, that is at the bottom of the ups and downs of business. In the old days the artisan shared with the farmer. Why in this post-war period has that not happened to the organized trades? Anybody who answers that question will answer the larger question.

At the close of the war we were threatened with an invasion of European goods at bankrupt prices. What was Congress at once asked to do? To erect a tariff wall for the express purpose of keeping the American market above the world market, for the express purpose of enabling the manufacturer to sell at a high price at home and dispose of his surplus abroad at what he could get for it.

But the moment somebody suggests that this same American market be kept for the farmer, at the same level of prices the manufacturer has, the farmers' surplus to be sold abroad at what it will bring, at once it is denounced as paternalism, State socialism, an interference with the natural laws of trade.

Now, why should the farmer be left to the world market and asked to listen to ancient platitudes about the natural laws of trade, when we are so prompt to move if the manufacturer is threatened? Why should the manufacturer be a national concern, for whom half the time of every Congress is taken adjusting tariffs, when the farmer is more distressed by world competition than the manufacturer?

If everybody would consider frankly what is involved in the creation of the Federal reserve banking system, we should have the American judgment on organized national efforts to sustain business, for the creation of the Federal reserve system was in direct violation of everything the standard economists say about the present situation. Fortunately, the debate has been heated enough and prolonged enough to permit everybody to know precisely what was involved.

The struggle for some national organization of banking was in Jackson's day, and for a generation was defeated by the determined State-sovereignty notions of "Old Hickory." The same plea was made then for the individual initiative of the local bank, for freedom from Government interference. Even when the Federal reserve system was forced in Congress everybody recalls how individual banks resisted it, how thy complained after it was organized over being forced to sustain it with cash capital and with deposits, much against their inclination. The Federal reserve banking system was in direct violation of the "economic law" and the "law of supply and demand" as preached to the farmer. Without any question whatever it was the handling of interest rates by the Federal Reserve Board that brought on such violent deflation and forced the farmers to such ruinous liquidation.

And yet the common judgment of the people is that if the Federal reserve system had not been instituted when it was, individual banking would not only not have seen us through the war, individual banking would not have got us started in the war. We should have been financially flat before we were well along to any big organized effort of any sort.

Coming back to the question why the farm is flat when the country is so suddenly rich in assets, we are just where we should have been if, with all our wealth, we had not had a national organization of bank credit for the war. The farm has been left to the "natural laws of trade" when everything else has been organized to resist the ups and downs of the natural laws of trade, the very men who lecture the farmer the most to "grin and bear it" being the ones who have been first to get the Nation organized and stabilized at the other end.

Now, there is one of two courses. We can either retrace our steps of stabilization and let every tub stand on its own bottom in the business world, under an unlimited competition of the natural laws of trade. Or we can go ahead with stabilization by taking all our great interests in under the same tent cover. The one course we can not pursue much longer with safety is to put one-half of our big business in under the tent cover of national organization and legislative protection and leave the other half out to meet the cold blasts of world competition without shelter.

It is fully time for the economists to be honest with themselves and face the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Judging from the editorial appearing in this morning's Washington Post, the farmers are all right. The writer of the editorial calls attention to the fact that just as soon as the farmers of South Dakota get their crops in they make tours to Florida, California, and other places.

Mr. BROOKHART. If there is any editorial page in the country that I would consign to the realms of concentrated ignorance all the time, it is that of the Washington Post.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Is that because of the Senator's particular love for the owner, Ed McLean, or because of the character of the propaganda that the newspaper conducts?

Mr. BROOKHART. It is because of both.

Mr. President, in connection with the editorial from the Des Moines Register I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement entitled "America's financial strength," from the Manchester Guardian, the statement being referred to in the editorial from the Des Moines newspaper. The figures given in that statement indicate some of the prosperity that has gone to other lines of business and that has been denied to agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is follows:

AMERICA'S FINANCIAL STRENGTH

(By Sir George Paish in Manchester Guardian Commercial)

The net sum of $294,000,000 of gold imported into the United States last year was somewhat larger than the $238,000,000 of gold imported in 1922, but in 1923 America's new foreign investments were reduced to $300,000,000 from $600,000,000 in the previous year, and allowance must be made for this. Still the fact remains that in 1923 America had a favorable balance of $600,000,000 after meeting all outgoings, and that she received payment for this sum half in gold and half in foreign securities.

The reason for the ability of America to maintain her exchange at gold parity is thus obvious. She has no difficulty in selling all the produce and goods she needs to sell in order to buy what she requires, and, as her requirements are not equal to her sales, she is able to make large foreign investments and to import great sums of gold. How greatly America's exports have exceeded her imports since 1914 will be obvious from the following:

America's foreign trade since 1915

Year	Exports	Imports	Exports over imports
1915	$2,716,000,000	$1,674,000,000	$1,042,000,000
1916	4,272,000,000	2,197,000,000	2,075,000,000
1917	6,227,000,000	2,639,000,000	3,588,000,000
1918	5,839,000,000	2,946,000,000	2,893,000,000
1919	7,750,000,000	3,904,000,000	3,846,000,000
1920	8,080,000,000	5,278,000,000	2,802,000,000
1921	4,485,000,000	2,509,000,000	1,976,000,000
1922	3,831,000,000	3,112,000,000	719,000,000
1923	4,165,000,000	3,789,000,000	376,000,000
9 years	47,365,000,000	28,060,000,000	19,270,000,000

The interest accruing to America upon her foreign investments has, during the whole of this period, more than taken care of her tourist expenditures, gifts to friends, and other invisible imports, and more than the whole of the favorable trade balance has been invested in foreign securities or has been received in gold. The total amount of securities, both American and foreign, purchased abroad in these nine years is about $20,000,000,000 over and above the receipt of $2,000,000,000 in gold. Prior to the war America employed foreign capital to the extent of about $6,000,000,000, upon which the annual interest charge to be paid abroad by her exports was about $300,000,000 per annum. The greater part of this foreign capital has now been repaid by America, and over and above this America now possesses some $15,000,000,000 of foreign securities, bringing to her an income of about $700,000,000 per annum, or a turnover from interest payable to interest receivable of nearly $1,000,000,000 per annum.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the amendment under consideration will help a little, but only a little; it will help somewhat to equalize and to lower freight rates and will assist agriculture to that extent. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Question!

Mr. BORAH. What is the question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the roll will be called.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Dill	Lodge	Reed, Pa.
Ashurst	Edge	McKellar	Robinson
Ball	Fess	McKinley	Sheppard
Borah	Frazier	McLean	Simmons
Brandegee	Gooding	McNary	Smith
Brookhart	Harris	Moses	Smoot
Bruce	Heflin	Neely	Spencer
Cameron	Johnson, Calif.	Norbeck	Sterling
Capper	Johnson, Minn.	Norris	Swanson
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Oddie	Trammell
Copeland	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Wadsworth
Cummins	Kendrick	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Keyes	Pittman	Warren
Dale	King	Ralston	Wheeler
Dial	Ladd	Ransdell	Willis

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] are attending a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators having answered to ther names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words by way of indorsement of the amendment upon the long-and-short-haul clause offered by my colleague [Mr. PITTMAN].

Our State, Nevada, has suffered severely for many years because of freight conditions and the uncertainty existing at the present time regarding them. The Intermountain States are practically all in a similar position. Our enterprises, manufacturing and commercial, must be stimulated. They have been throttled to an extreme, with the result of holding back our growth and prosperity to a very serious extent. It is unfair, uneconomic, and unjust. The growth of our Intermountain States can hurt nobody. It will benefit the whole United States, and especially the Pacific coast. The more business that is developed there the larger and the more prosperous the population and the greater the benefits that will come to the whole Pacific coast.

I refer to the action of George Washington before the Revolution, as outlined in a letter of his to England written about that time, in which he criticized the British for their attitude toward the Colonies, an attitude of suppression, an attitude which tended to hold down the growth of their industries. He suggested that if that were changed and the manufacturing and various other industries in the Colonies were allowed to prosper and grow, it would result in greater business to England. The policy he complained of is similar to that followed by the railroads and the Pacific coast toward the Intermountain States. England later changed her policy toward her Colonies in this particular and they then started to grow and prosper. The more the Intermountain States grow the more their prosperity will be reflected in increased business throughout the country. The manufacturing States of the East will benefit very largely by their growth and development.

I can see very plainly that the railroads themselves will benefit by this amendment in the end. The more business we have in the Intermountain States the more prosperous they will be and the more business the railroads will have. It is not a case where they should try to figure merely on the dollars and cents profits on the existing business and conditions. They should look to the future.

Years ago, when the Atlantic Coast States were the only ones in the Union, business began gradually growing and expanding to the West. If the policy that is now being pursued by the opponents of this amendment had been followed at that time, we would not have had any Middle West or West.

Mr. President, I want to see this amendment adopted, and I want to see it considered in an economic way. My colleague [Mr. PITTMAN] has gone into the legal and other aspects of this matter very thoroughly. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] has gone into the business end of it in a very able manner. I simply want to add my voice of approval to this amendment, and to say that if it should be agreed to we will have an era of prosperity in the Intermountain States which will reflect itself on the whole United States. We have a class of people out there who have braved the elements, who have pioneered, and who are entitled to at least a living chance to get ahead; which they do not have to-day. I hope this amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the able Senator from Massachusetts whether it is his intention to have an executive session this evening?

Mr. LODGE. It is the desire to have an executive session before the Senate adjourns or takes a recess.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, it seems that we have reached somewhat a state of impasse on the pending bill. I do not want to do anything in the world to obstruct its passage; quite the contrary. There is some other important legislation, however; and I should like to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1889, the postal salary readjustment bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it would take too long to consider that.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with the plans of the Senator in charge of the bill. Whenever it is agreeable to him I shall be glad to move an executive session.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, perhaps I may be permitted to make a very brief observation.

On Monday at 2 o'clock the War Department appropriation bill was handed down as the unfinished business. The consideration of the text of the bill was completed by 3.30 that afternoon. Since then the discussion has proceeded upon a subject which has not yet been presented to the Senate in the form of an amendment or in any other form.

We have now discussed this matter the equivalent of three days. Regardless of our opinion of the merits of the amendment which we are informed will at some future time be offered to the bill, I think it proper to remind Senators that thus far only two of the great appropriation bills have passed both Houses and have been sent to the White House. The delay upon this bill, of course, has the effect of banking up behind it not only the appropriation bills which have not yet reached the Senate as a body at all but also other measures of great importance and of great interest to many Members of the Senate; and I include in that category the so-called farm-relief legislation. We have conflicting ideas as to that, and there are several bills pending on that question. The bill which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has just endeavored by unanimous consent to bring before the Senate is another bill which attracts the favorable attention of a good many Senators; and if one should go through the calendar which is still unacted upon, one would find many, many bills of great interest to Senators and of great importance to the country.

Mr. President, I have no special liking for night sessions. I have engagements, as other Senators have them, which I shall find it exceedingly difficult and embarrassing to break; but we are confronted with a situation which we can not ignore. If I may be permitted to express myself in such fashion, either this amendment should be offered and the Senate allowed to act upon it, or it should not be offered.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I want to say to the Senator that, so far as I am concerned, I am trying to find out whether or not we need any appropriation for rivers and harbors in this country. If we are going to destroy the opportunity for their use, it seems to me it is a waste of money to appropriate money to develop further our rivers and harbors—that is, to the extent provided for in this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All the Senator has to do is to move to strike out the appropriation for rivers and harbors which is contained in this bill, and I think probably he would be the only Senator who would vote in favor of it.

Mr. KING. No; I shall vote for it, too.

Mr. GOODING. I hope the Senator will not try to throttle debate here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why, Mr. President, there is no means that I could employ that would throttle debate. If I could throttle debate, I would have done it two days ago. There have been three days of debate on something that is not before the Senate at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The matter is just as much before the Senate as it would have been if it had been presented as an amendment. It has been presented by the Senator from Nevada, it has been printed, it is on the desk of every Senator. They all know what they are discussing. They all know that whenever the discussion is completed the amendment is going to be offered, that it is going to be acted on, that a point of order will be made, and that the minute the point of order is made the debate will cease to be on the merits of the matter and will be on the parliamentary situation.

As I stated to the Senator from New York when we started, my reason for that was simply this, and nothing else, that I desired that this subject, which I conceive to be of great importance—and some other Senators think so, too—should be understood by the Senate. I feel that it will be better understood through the procedure I have taken than it would have been understood if the debate had instantly gone off on a parliamentary point. That was my sole reason for the action I have taken.

I want to say to the Senator that I have not participated in any filibuster on this question, and I do not think any other Senator has participated in a filibuster on it. I am perfectly conscious of the fact that I have spoken at length. I did not try to do so, however. I was dealing with statistics which bear on this question, and I quoted only a very few of those. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] has also been dealing with essential facts bearing on the question.

I stated before to the Senator—whether I stated it to him on the floor or privately I do not remember—that it was a subject which was going to be discussed not for the purpose of delay but that Senators who are intensely interested in this question and believe it is of an extremely important character were desirous that those Senators who had not participated in the study of the question before the committee which had it in charge might at least understand the subject.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have entire sympathy with the Senator in wanting this subject understood, and I appreciate its great importance; but if I may be permitted to say so, I think the reasonable and indeed the more expeditious way to get a decision on the question upon its merits is to permit the War Department appropriation bill to pass and go to conference, and then, if the supporters of the measure so desire, move to take up the bill, which is now on the calendar. If there is a sufficient number of votes to attach it to the War Department appropriation bill, where everybody admits it does not belong at all, then there is a sufficient number of votes to take it up and pass it.

But the trouble in the situation is that by attempting to attach it to the War Department appropriation bill the question is thrown into a parliamentary tangle and becomes a parliamentary issue rather than a question of the merits of the bill; and if the proponents of this measure desire the quickest possible effective action by the Senate, why not move to put the measure before the Senate? That is apparently not their intention. They intend to propose it as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill, and it will be subject to a point of order.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, how many times previously have the river and harbor appropriations been placed on the War Department appropriation bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For the last three years, since the rules of the House of Representatives were changed.

Mr. PITTMAN. May I answer just two statements made by the Senator, in his time?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would be very glad to have the suggestions of the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator has stated, in the first place, that the simple method is, if we have a measure we want enacted, to take up the bill and pass it. That suggestion would be entirely sound and past contravention if this were the only body in the Congress; but it happens that nothing becomes a law until it has passed both branches of Congress. Consequently, in considering it we have to consider the parliamentary situation in two bodies.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have that in mind, too; with some experience along that line.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no doubt whatever that we can pass it in the form of a bill through the Senate, and I am perfectly confident, from the debates that have taken place here in the past, that this body is entirely in favor of this proposition. But, mind you, I am also conscious of the fact that the rules of the House, and the parliamentary proceedings in that body, make it possible and very probable that it would never come on the floor of the House out of the committee. That is one reason why I have pursued this policy. If it were earlier in the session, it might be different; but it is not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps we might discuss it from the practical standpoint. I have had experience in conferences between the Senate and the House, and under the rules as to conferences and conference reports, House conferees have taken one steady, consistent stand on legislation attached by the Senate to general appropriation bills, and that is this, that they will not even discuss the matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is a very unfortunate thing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They will not even discuss it. They say that it is in such direct violation of every rule of the House that they will not even take it back to the House. I have run up against that myself. That is their general attitude toward legislation attached by the Senate to a general appropriation bill.

Suppose we could persuade the House conferees on the War Department appropriation bill to submit this matter to the House for special instructions; thereupon the supporters of this measure in the House would find themselves confronted by the obstacle of the House rules and the tradition of the House, who have declared again and again in the last five years that they will not permit the Senate to force down their throats legislation attached by the Senate to an appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I say in all sincerity that the supporters of this measure are picking out the most difficult way to get it enacted. They are summoning up in its path every conceivable objection which can be found in the House rules and in the traditions and the pride of the House. The House simply will not accept it.

The quick and proper method, I say in all humility to those who are managing this proposition, as I assume, is to pass through the Senate in regular fashion the bill on the calendar dealing with the long and the short haul clause and send it to the House. I remind the Senator from Nevada that the other body has amended its rules at the present session providing for a method of discharging a committee from the consideration of a bill.

The responsibility is with the Senators who are supporting this measure, and who, in my humble judgment, are selecting the most difficult way they could possibly find in order to get their legislation enacted.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator for his advice. I realize perfectly he would like to help those who are advocating this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the observation of the Senator draws from me an observation in turn. I will vote to bring the Senator's bill before the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is a very good idea, but I am afraid the Senator's support in the Senate will not help us very much in the House. If the Senator could use his great influence with the leaders of the House to get an assurance for us that it would be brought on the calendar in the House, it would be very valuable assistance.

The Senator tells us of the difficulties of passing legislation through the House. It is an unfortunate situation when one of two bodies which must pass on laws assume that they may regulate the method of procedure in the other branch of Congress. That thing is intolerable. The House may regulate the presentation of amendments in the House. They have a right to do that. But this thing is certainly going beyond its natural jurisdiction when it states the method of amending a bill in the Senate, and if we have come down to the point where no matter what this body desires to adopt as a parliamentary procedure we can not adopt it unless it is the parliamentary procedure of the House, then we should abolish our rules altogether and adopt the rules of the House.

We should ask the House when we might change our method of amending bills, because we can not amend them in any other way than that which is agreeable to them. We might as well try that situation out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has been tried out before several times.

Mr. PITTMAN. But this is a delightful time to try it out now. I say to the Senator right now that there are those here in this body who think so seriously of this legislation—and I have tried to convince them that I do—that we do not see the necessity for the appropriation of money for the Panama Canal if they are going to uphold in Congress a law permitting the Interstate Commerce Commission to drive half of the ships off the Panama Canal. We do not see the necessity of appropriating money to make navigable the inland waterways of the country if Congress at the same time, with knowledge covering 30 or 40 years, is going to sit supinely by and permit one of its agents, the Interstate Commerce Commission, to misconstrue the laws of this body to such an extent as to make those appropriations useless.

I am in favor of improving the inland waterways and the harbors of this country and maintaining the Panama Canal, but I am not in favor of appropriating the money solely for the purpose of expending it. If it is not in aid of navigation and if it does not result in navigation, it is a waste of the money of the people of the country. And when you say that another body than this will tell us how we may legislate in this body, how we may amend our bills in this body, when we shall, and when we shall not, I say it is time to try the question out, and for one, if this body sees fit to attach any amendment to the bill, I am willing to try it out with the House, and if they insist upon controlling our methods of legislation in this body, say "The responsibility for lack of legislation is on you and not on us."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say only a word. I may want to discuss this matter at length later.

For a great many years two things have been taking place both in the House and in the Senate. Ever since I have been in public life the question of the long and the short haul in a commerce law has been a live one and always agitated. Time and again Congress has thought, or I have presumed they thought, for I did, that the law was amended so that an evil, which, it seems to me, must be conceded to be a great evil, would be remedied, but each and every time by some hook or crook or legerdemain or decision or manipulation what Congress thought had become a remedial piece of legislation became nothing, not worth the paper on which it was written, and we still have the question unsettled. That has been with us for 20 years. The injustice has been pointed out continually.

Another thing which has been with us has been the river and harbor appropriation bill. Quite a large number of Members of the Senate and of the House have been fighting river and harbor appropriation bills. I have joined with them myself on several occasions; and the thing that moved me, and I suppose it has influenced everybody else in the same attitude, was the fact that we were appropriating millions of dollars—yes, hundreds of millions—for the improvement of our rivers, to make them navigable, just to see them drift full of sand and never be used, and the people get no benefit out of them.

That has been the principal reason why I have opposed river and harbor bills in the past. I have seen the money of the taxpayers thrown into these streams and no good come from it because of the evil that existed, and which we have tried to cure by changing the long-and-short-haul clause to prevent the railroad companies from putting the boats out of commission on the rivers by rates that were too low, and when they got the boats off raising the rates again. As long as the men who were otherwise engaged in river transportation knew that was possible they simply abstained from going into it, and our rivers do us no good.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], in answer to a question by me, said the river and harbor appropriations had been included in the War Department appropriation bill for the last three years, since the House rules were changed. I am not familiar with the changes in the rules of the House, but I am familiar with what happened to river and harbor bills in the House previous to the change in the rules. The fact was that they were killed by votes in the House, if not in the Senate also. It looks to me like this is a method to drag in appropriations for rivers and harbors by attaching them to the War Department appropriation bill. If we are going to drag in appropriations for rivers and harbors, we ought to drag in legislation also that will have some controlling effect upon the value of the rivers and harbors.

Mr. NORRIS. My attitude on the appropriation proposed in the pending bill with reference to rivers depends a great deal upon what happens to this amendment. I am not willing to be a party to appropriating money to build up our rivers and then see the money literally thrown away. On the other hand, I believe most sincerely that we can afford to appropriate public money for the improvement of our rivers and making them navigable if we will protect the navigation on them after we have done that. The amendment under consideration is intended to do that, and I think will do it.

Therefore, so far as I am concerned, if there are enough Senators who feel as I do, if the amendment or something like it is not put on the bill, I am ready to go into any kind of a fight against the part of the bill relating to appropriations for rivers and harbors. I think they ought to be cut away down if we are going to keep this amendment out. To my mind, the amendment involves a fundamental principle of transportation. While I know that a great many people are opposed to that kind of legislation, I do believe that they are moved, perhaps unconsciously, by selfish interests of the different localities of the country. A favored spot, a favored city, a favored harbor, a favored market, under present conditions built up at the expense of the people who live in the interior of the country, away from those favored spots, naturally, if selfishness prompts them, are opposed to this kind of legislation. I think it is a serious proposition. I do not ask that the legislation be passed. I must abide by the majority vote of the Senate and the House, but I think that we are entitled to a fair, square, honest vote on the proposition.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I would like to have the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I want to say that I am just as anxious to get the matter disposed of as is the Senator. The only difference in the matter is that the Senator said he would cut off the debate if he could, while I would not do that. There are Senators who have announced to me a desire to discuss the question. One of them is the Senator who has just entered the Chamber, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, Mr. SMITH. I think very probably he is as familiar now with this subject as anyone in the Senate. He was chairman of the committee that reported out the bill which is the foundation of the amendment.

There are other Senators here who are especially interested in the matter. They have stated that they want to discuss it. They are as much interested as I am and have as much right to discuss it. They probably are more familiar with it than I am and certainly can present it better than I have done. Therefore I say, as I have said frankly all the time, as soon as those who desire to discuss it are ready to quit discussing it, I will present the amendment.

I will state to the Senator now that from information I have at the present time from those who desire to speak, I do not think there will be over probably two or three hours more discussion. That, of course, is a rough guess; but knowing those who are going to speak, that is my opinion. I feel perfectly confident that I can present the amendment to-morrow and then let it take its parliamentary course. That is the way I feel about it. It would seem that way to me now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator entertain a suggestion that an hour to-morrow be fixed at which debate on the proposed amendment shall cease and the amendment shall be introduced and the question of parliamentary procedure decided without further debate?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am hardly in a position to do that, for the sole reason that I have not conferred with those who are supporting the matter. I only speak for those whom I know said they desire to discuss it. If there is no objection made by anyone here, I would state this—because I have no way of knowing their thoughts on the subject—that I will present the amendment at some hour that might be agreed on to-morrow, which would practically throw the debate directly on the parliamentary situation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So far as I may make an agreement, it would be only binding upon myself.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is all I can do now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would be willing to enter into some satisfactory agreement, say, to cease debate at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I do not think it is possible to reach any agreement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator be willing to agree to conclude debate on this particular matter by 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon?

Mr. GOODING. Not until I shall have consulted with those whom I know want to speak on the subject, which I have not done. I may be able to answer the Senator to-morrow at 12 o'clock possibly, but before entering into an agreement on the matter I must consult with those whom I know want to discuss it. Just how long they will want to talk I do not know. I still have some observations that I desire to make.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think at this moment that it would be impossible to reach a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. GOODING. I am sure of that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the Senator from Idaho think we can get through the main speeches to-morrow and let me submit the amendment and let it be considered on the parliamentary feature of the matter?

Mr. GOODING. That might be possible, but I have not consulted any of the Senators as to the time they may desire to take. Probably we can do that, but it would be out of place to enter into an agreement at this time. It seems to me the whole matter might well go over until to-morrow. I do not think we can come to an agreement to-night.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I said, as soon as the main speeches shall have been made on the proposition, so that the discussion from that time on will be purely a parliamentary discussion, I want to present the amendment. I understand the Senator from New York will make his point of order at the time I submit the amendment and from that time the discussion will be purely on the parliamentary question. That seems to be the situation in which we find ourselves at this time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any disposition to cut off proper debate at any time, but it seems to me that the Senate must either meet promptly in the morning, or it must run its business into the night hours, or it must cease some of this important debate—I will admit that it is important—if we expect to adjourn in ordinary season this year. Think of the spectacle of the Senate of the United States taking in the usual way a recess until 11 o'clock in the morning and assembling here without a quorum and having the Sergeant at Arms and his employees running in every direction for Senators and, finally, compelling the leader of the minority on the other side of the Chamber to move an adjournment until 12 o'clock. This could have been done on either side of the Chamber, so far as that is concerned, and it was the only proper thing we could do. But I think the spectacle to the country and the show we made of ourselves is putting us in the position that if we will not come here and get to work, and if we will not stay here at night and work, we will be accused of filibustering, and we can not expect otherwise. I do not accuse the Senator from Nevada of that, or any other Senator, but the country will believe it, and we will soon have to believe it ourselves. I will have to believe it, so far as I am concerned, because I know we can get here in the morning if we like, and I also know that we can stay here at night, whether we like it or not.

I am perfectly ready, so far as I am concerned, to come to any reasonable agreement as to the time to-morrow or to-morrow night, or whenever it can be arranged, when the amendment shall be submitted and voted on. Of course, as I said, I am going to yield to whatever the Senate wants to have done. I am always ready to take its orders, but I still say, and I think it will not be disputed by my friend from Nevada, that we either "ought to fish or cut bait," to use the farmer's phrase. We ought to be here to talk or here to act, or else say that we can not and recess for a few days or for a week until we shall finally be able to work.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thoroughly agree with the Senator, and that is exactly what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said this morning, that "we ought to fish or cut bait." The Senator, of course, said he did not accuse me of not being here this morning. I want it affirmatively known that I was here this morning. I also want it said for the benefit of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] that at 11 o'clock this morning he was standing in front of his map with his pointer in his hand, ready to finish the speech upon which he was engaged yesterday.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from Nevada will not take what I said as being personal to any of those who have occupied the time of the Senate. In fact, I honor them for their punctuality and being here all the time and saying what they have to say. But it is those who have nothing to do apparently with legislation who ought to loan us at least their presence in the morning to answer the roll call. They ought not to leave it to those who do the work to be compelled to run after them to get them here so that they will join us in simply having a roll call.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am willing to come here at any hour in the morning that may be decided to be the proper hour. I think if we could have gotten a quorum at 11 o'clock this morning we would have been quite a bit further ahead than we seem to be now.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it that what the Senator from Wyoming said does not apply to those who were here. It must apply to those who were not here. I was not here, so it must apply to me as one, and yet I think I was doing more work than the average Senator from 6 o'clock this morning until 12 o'clock, when I did get here.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are crowded and condemned on the one hand because they do not finish their work. They can not finish their work if the Senate requires their attendance here, and you can "fish or cut bait" on that proposition just as you have a mind to do.

I am accused half the time, at least inferentially, on the one side by saying: "Here, we want to get this Muscle Shoals business out of the way," and I am asked about every 15 minutes if I am still going along with it, and on the other hand condemned because I am not here in the Senate Chamber. Senators can take their choice. If the Senate, on the one hand, wants to stop the hearings of the committee, it of course has the power to do it, and it can compel by arrest the attendance of Senators here; but I do not want anybody to insinuate that those who are working night and day on a proposition of as great importance as any one of the bills which we are now discussing, even though I do regard this as a very important proposition, are not doing their best to get the Muscle Shoals matter ready for the Senate, or are idling away their time by any means.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. NORRIS. There is no other committee of the Senate—I except none and I defy anyone to successfully contradict it—that has done as much work during this session of the Senate as has the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Of course all the members of the committee are never there at one time, but there are a few there, and the chairman is always there, and we try conscientiously to do what we can. There are some other committees in much the same position. I see the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] in his place. He is chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, which is carrying on an investigation. The fact is, Mr. President, that nobody can be in two places at one time, and he ought not to be expected to be. I protest against the Senate meeting at 11 o'clock unless it first directs that the committees, particularly the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman, shall cease work. When the Senate orders us to quit we have to obey; but I am not going, on the one hand, to be accused of delaying legislation pending before that committee, and on the other hand, to be condemned because I am there trying to push the work of the committee and to keep it going just as rapidly as it can possibly be pushed along.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the able Senator from Nebraska has stated the case very well as to the committees meeting in the morning. I honor the committees for so doing and for carrying forward their work, and that is why I say if we can not meet earlier in the morning—and I never have asked the Senate to meet at 11 o'clock in the morning, as I remember, certainly I have not done so lately—we should have sessions in the evening.

I alluded to the fact that the pending appropriation bill ought to be drawn to a conclusion to-day, in order to indicate to the Senate that it ought to remain in session to-night, and I wish the Senate might remain in session to-night. It seems to me to be necessary, with all the committee work which it is necessary to do, that opportunity should be given for them to conclude their work, and that could be done by having the Senate meet at the usual time, and then sitting in the evening. I hope the Senator will remember that the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, is one of the committees which is busy every morning. We ought to have time for the work of the committees and also sufficient time to keep matters moving along in the Senate as smoothly as possible.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to see the business of the Senate move along. I would not object to a reasonable limitation on debate in the Senate; but I think we ought to face the fact that, unless we do put some limitation on debate here, it will be an impossibility for the Senate to adjourn at the time when a good many Senators say it is going to adjourn, namely, early in June. It can not be done, Mr. President, unless some drastic method is adopted, several of which I have suggested. Either we must stop the committees in their work, or we must make up our minds that we are not going to get through by the 7th day of June. I wish we could adjourn on the 1st of June; it means more to me than to most Senators to be compelled to remain in Washington during the hot weather; but I want to say to you frankly, Mr. President, that, however much we may desire to do it, however delighted we might be if it could be done, I have reached the conclusion that it is an impossibility, and we might just as well face the inevitable. We can not finally adjourn then, but we will have to stay here longer.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I think I owe it to the Committee on Public Lands to make a brief statement. The Committee on Public Lands has been in session practically every day since the 20th of last November. The room in which we are holding the committee hearings, the "marble room," so called, in the Office Building, has no bell connections with the Senate, so that we know nothing about whether there is a call for a quorum or whether the Senate is in session. We might not come if there were a bell; but, at least, if there were a bell we would know when there was a call for a quorum. If that room is to be used for committee hearings in the future, there should be some provision for notifying Senators who are working in committee there as to when their presence is required in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am very glad that there have been brought out the facts and circumstances which have been developed from the statements made this evening. I understand that many Senators have engagements for to-night, and I understand further from the Senator who is particularly in charge of the proposed amendment to the pending bill that other Senators are not ready to go on to-night. So I think that the better course would be to take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, unless some Senator desires to discuss further the pending question.

Mr. LODGE. I should like an opportunity to have a short executive session.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that when the Senate completes its session to-day it take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATOR BURTON K. WHEELER

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to submit the report of the special committee authorized under Senate Resolution 206 to investigate the charges against Senator BURTON K. WHEELER. This report is signed by four members of the committee. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] reserved the right to file separate views. I submit the report for reading and printing, and later shall discuss it upon the floor.

The report (No. 537) was read and ordered to be printed, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 537, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session]

SENATOR BURTON K. WHEELER

Mr. BORAH, from the special committee authorized to investigate charges against Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, submitted the following report pursuant to S. Res. 206:

On April 9, 1924, the Senate passed the following resolution:

> "Resolved, That a committee consisting of five Members of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore to investigate and report to the Senate the facts in relation to the charges made in a certain indictment returned against Senator BURTON K. WHEELER in the United States district court for the State of Montana."

That thereafter the President pro tempore of the Senate appointed Senators WILLIAM E. BORAH, CLAUDE SWANSON, THOMAS STERLING, T. H. CARAWAY, and CHARLES L. MCNARY as a special committee to make the investigation authorized by the foregoing resolution.

The charge against Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, and which charge your committee was authorized to investigate, arises under and by virtue of section 1782 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That statute reads as follows:

> "No Senator, Representative, or Delegate, after his election and during his continuance in office, and no head of a department or other officer or clerk in the employ of the Government, shall receive or agree to receive any compensation whatever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered, or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party, or directly or indirectly interested, before any department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever. Every person offending against this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not more than two years, and fined not more than $10,000, and shall, moreover, by conviction therefor, be rendered forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States."

The Supreme Court has construed this statute particularly in the case of Burton v. the United States, 202 U. S. p. 344.

Under this statute an agreement to receive compensation for services rendered, or to be rendered, before any department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission is made an offense; the receiving of compensation in violation of the statute whether pursuant to a previous agreement or not is also made an offense. In other words, if a party agrees to receive compensation for such services he is guilty under the statute; or if he receives compensation without any previous agreement, he is also guilty of an offense. This statute in no way prohibits or interferes with a Member of Congress from appearing before any department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission, provided he does so free from any agreement to receive compensation, or without receiving compensation therefor. The sole question which your committee was authorized to investigate, therefore, was: Did Senator WHEELER agree to receive compensation, directly or indirectly, for services rendered, or to be rendered; or did he receive compensation for services rendered, or to be rendered, relative to his appearance or services before any department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission?

Your committee finds:

First. That during the months of January and February, 1923, after his election to the Senate, Senator WHEELER entered the employ of Gordon Campbell as his attorney, the said contract of employment including the firm of lawyers under the name of Wheeler & Baldwin.

Second. That, according to the terms of employment by which he entered the service of Campbell as his attorney, the said firm of Wheeler & Baldwin was to receive a retainer's fee of $10,000 per annum; that $2,000 thereof was paid January 9, 1923, and $2,000 thereof on February 16, 1923, and that the balance is still unpaid.

Third. That it was fully understood and agreed between all parties to said contract of employment that the services of Senator WHEELER and his firm related alone to the litigation then pending, or to be brought, in the State courts of Montana, said Campbell being at that time interested in a number of lawsuits, some 19 or 20 at least in number.

Fourth. That said BURTON K. WHEELER did not at any time agree to receive compensation for services before any department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission, at Washington, and did not at any time receive compensation for such services before any department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission.

Fifth. That, on the other hand, the sole contract of employment which he had with Campbell related to matters of litigation in the State courts of Montana; that Senator WHEELER did not at any time appear for said Campbell, or his companies, before any of the departments in Washington under agreement to receive compensation, and did not at any time receive compensation for any appearance or services rendered before said Government departments.

In conclusion, the committee wholly exonerates Senator BURTON K. WHEELER from any, and all, violation of section 1782 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and finds that he neither received or accepted, or agreed to receive or accept, any compensation whatever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered, or to be rendered, to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States was a party, or directly or indirectly interested, before any department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever.

The committee further states that in its opinion Senator WHEELER was careful to have it known and understood from the beginning that his services as an attorney for Gordon Campbell, or his interests, were to be confined exclusively to matters of litigation in the State courts of Montana, and that he observed at all times not only the letter but the spirit of the law.

WM. E. BORAH.
CHAS. L. MCNARY.
CLAUDE A. SWANSON.
T. H. CARAWAY.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RIGHTS IN SYRIA AND THE LEBANON

In executive session this day, the following convention was ratified, and, on motion of Mr. LODGE, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate of the United States:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, I transmit herewith a convention, signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and France at Paris on April 4, 1924, respecting the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in Syria and the Lebanon, over which a mandate was conferred upon the Government of France.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 28, 1924.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a convention between the United States and France with respect to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in Syria and the Lebanon, over which a mandate was conferred upon the Government of France, signed at Paris on April 4, 1924.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 25, 1924.

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND FRANCE REGARDING THE MANDATE FOR SYRIA AND THE LEBANON

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic.

Whereas by the treaty of peace concluded with the allied powers Turkey renounces all her rights and titles over Syria and the Lebanon; and

Whereas article 22 of the covenant of the League of Nations in the treaty of Versailles provides that in the case of certain territories which as a consequence of the late war ceased to be under the sovereignty of the states which formerly governed them mandates should be issued and that the terms of the mandate should be explicitly defined in each case by the council of the league; and

Whereas the principal allied powers have agreed to intrust the mandate for Syria and the Lebanon to France; and

Whereas the terms of the said mandate have been defined by the Council of the League of Nations, as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The mandatory shall frame, within a period of three years from the coming into force of this mandate, an organic law for Syria and for the Lebanon.

This organic law shall be framed in agreement with the native authorities and shall take into account the rights, interests, and wishes of all the population inhabiting the said territory. The mandatory shall further enact measures to facilitate the progressive development of Syria and the Lebanon as independent states. Pending the coming into effect of the organic law, the government of Syria and the Lebanon shall be conducted in accordance with the spirit of this mandate.

The mandatory shall, as far as circumstances permit, encourage local autonomy.

ART. 2. The mandatory may maintain its troops in the said territory for its defense. It shall further be empowered, until the entry into force of the organic law and the reestablishment of public security, to organize such local militia as may be necessary for the defense of the territory and to employ this militia for defense and also for the maintenance of order. These local forces may only be recruited from the inhabitants of the said territory.

The said militia shall thereafter be under the local authorities, subject to the authority and the control which the mandatory shall retain over these forces. It shall not be used for purposes other than those above specified save with the consent of the mandatory.

Nothing shall preclude Syria and the Lebanon from contributing to the cost of the maintenance of the forces of the mandatory stationed in the territory.

The mandatory shall at all times possess the right to make use of the ports, railways, and means of communication of Syria and the Lebanon for the passage of its troops and of all materials, supplies, and fuel.

ART. 3. The mandatory shall be intrusted with the exclusive control of the foreign relations of Syria and the Lebanon and with the right to issue exequaturs to the consuls appointed by foreign powers. Nationals of Syria and the Lebanon living outside the limits of the territory shall be under the diplomatic and consular protection of the mandatory.

ART. 4. The mandatory shall be responsible for seeing that no part of the territory of Syria and the Lebanon is ceded or leased or in any way placed under the control of a foreign power.

ART. 5. The privileges and immunities of foreigners, including the benefits of consular jurisdiction and protection as formerly enjoyed by capitulation or usage in the Ottoman Empire, shall not be applicable in Syria and the Lebanon. Foreign consular tribunals shall, however, continue to perform their duties until the coming into force of the new legal organization provided for in article 6.

Unless the powers whose nationals enjoyed the aforementioned privileges and immunities on August 1, 1914, shall have previously renounced the right to their reestablishment, or shall have agreed to their nonapplication during a specified period, these privileges and immunities shall at the expiration of the mandate be immediately reestablished in their entirety or with such modifications as may have been agreed upon between the powers concerned.

ART. 6. The mandatory shall establish in Syria and the Lebanon a judicial system which shall assure to natives as well as to foreigners a complete guarantee of their rights.

Respect for the personal status of the various peoples and for their religious interests shall be fully guaranteed. In particular the control and administration of Wakfs shall be exercised in complete accordance with religious law and the dispositions of the founders.

ART. 7. Pending the conclusion of special extradition agreements, the extradition treaties at present in force between foreign powers and the mandatory shall apply within the territory of Syria and the Lebanon.

ART. 8. The mandatory shall insure to all complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality. No discrimination of any kind shall be made between the inhabitants of Syria and the Lebanon on the ground of differences in race, religion, or language.

The mandatory shall encourage public instruction which shall be given through the medium of the native languages in use in the territory of Syria and the Lebanon.

The right of each community to maintain its own schools for the instruction and education of its own members in its own language, while conforming to such educational requirements of a general nature as the administration may impose, shall not be denied or impaired.

ART. 9. The mandatory shall refrain from all interference in the administration of the councils of management (conseils de fabrique) or in the management of religious communities and sacred shrines belonging to the various religions, the immunity of which has been expressly guaranteed.

ART. 10. The supervision exercised by the mandatory over the religious missions in Syria and the Lebanon shall be limited to the maintenance of public order and good government. The activities of these religious missions shall in no way be restricted nor shall their members be subjected to any restrictive measures on the ground of nationality, provided that their activities are confined to the domain of religion.

The religious missions may also concern themselves with education and relief, subject to the general right of regulation and control by the mandatory or of the local government in regard to education, public instruction, and charitable relief.

ART. 11. The mandatory shall see that there is no discrimination in Syria or the Lebanon against the nationals, including societies and associations of any state member of the League of Nations as compared with its own nationals, including societies and associations, or with the nationals of any other foreign state in matters concerning taxation or commerce, the exercise of professions or industries, or navigation, or in the treatment of ships or aircraft. Similarly there shall be no discrimination in Syria or the Lebanon against goods originating in or destined for any of the said states; there shall be freedom of transit, under equitable conditions, across the said territory.

Subject to the above, the mandatory may impose or cause to be imposed by the local governments such taxes and customs duties as it may consider necessary. The mandatory, or the local governments acting under its advice, may also conclude on grounds of contiguity any special customs arrangements with an adjoining country.

The mandatory may take or cause to be taken, subject to the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article, such steps as it may think best to insure the development of the natural resources of the said territory and to safeguard the interests of the local population.

Concessions for the development of these natural resources shall be granted without distinction of nationality between the nationals of all states members of the League of Nations, but on condition that they do not infringe upon the authority of the local government. Concessions in the nature of a general monopoly shall not be granted. This clause shall in no way limit the right of the mandatory to create monopolies of a purely fiscal character in the interest of the territory of Syria and the Lebanon, and with a view to assuring to the territory the fiscal resources which would appear best adapted to the local needs, or, in certain cases, with a view to developing the natural resources either directly by the state or through an organization under its control, provided that this does not involve either directly or indirectly the creation of a monopoly of the natural resources in favor of the mandatory or its nationals, nor involve any preferential treatment which would be incompatible with the economic, commercial, and industrial equality guaranteed above.

ART. 12. The mandatory shall adhere, on behalf of Syria and the Lebanon, to any general international agreements already existing, or which may be concluded hereafter with the approval of the League of Nations, in respect of the following: The slave trade, the traffic in drugs, the traffic in arms and ammunition, commercial equality, freedom of transit and navigation, aerial navigation, postal, telegraphic, or wireless communications, and measures for the protection of literature, art, or industries.

ART. 13. The mandatory shall secure the adhesion of Syria and the Lebanon so far as social, religious, and other conditions permit, to such measures of common utility as may be adopted by the League of Nations for preventing and combating disease, including diseases of animals and plants.

ART. 14. The mandatory shall draw up and put into force within 12 months from this date a law of antiquities in conformity with the following provisions. This law shall insure equality of treatment in the matter of excavations and archæological research to the nationals of all states members of the League of Nations.

1. "Antiquity" means any construction or any product of human activity earlier than the year 1700 A. D.

2. The law for the protection of antiquities shall proceed by encouragement rather than by threat.

Any person who, having discovered an antiquity without being furnished with the authorization referred to in paragraph 5, reports the same to an official of the competent department shall be rewarded according to the value of the discovery.

3. No antiquity may be disposed of except to the competent department unless this department renounces the acquisition of any such antiquity.

No antiquity may leave the country without an export license from the said department.

4. Any person who maliciously or negligently destroys or damages an antiquity shall be liable to a penalty to be fixed.

5. No clearing of ground or digging with the object of finding antiquities shall be permitted, under penalty of fine, except to persons authorized by the competent department.

6. Equitable terms shall be fixed for expropriation, temporary or permanent, of lands which might be of historical or archæological interest.

7. Authorization to excavate shall only be granted to persons who show sufficient guaranties of archæological experience. The mandatory shall not, in granting these authorizations, act in such a way as to exclude scholars of any nation without good grounds.

8. The proceeds of excavations may be divided between the excavator and the competent department in a proportion fixed by that department. If division seems impossible for scientific reasons the excavator shall receive a fair indemnity in lieu of a part of the find.

ART. 15. Upon the coming into force of the organic law referred to in article 1, an arrangement shall be made between the mandatory and the local governments for reimbursement by the latter of all expenses incurred by the mandatory in organizing the administration, developing local resources, and carrying out permanent public works, of which the country retains the benefit. Such arrangement shall be communicated to the Council of the League of Nations.

ART. 16. French and Arabic shall be the official language of Syria and the Lebanon.

ART. 17. The mandatory shall make to the Council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council as to the measures taken during the year to carry out the provisions of this mandate. Copies of all laws and regulations promulgated during the year shall be attached to the said report.

ART. 18. The consent of the Council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of this mandate.

ART. 19. On the termination of the mandate, the Council of the League of Nations shall use its influence to safeguard for the future the fulfillment by the Government of Syria and the Lebanon of the financial obligations, including pensions and allowances, regularly assumed by the administration of Syria or of the Lebanon during the period of the mandate.

ART. 20. The mandatory agrees that if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Whereas the mandate in the above terms came into force on September 29, 1923; and

Whereas the United States of America by participating in the war against Germany contributed to her defeat and the defeat of her allies and to the renunciation of the rights and titles of her allies in the territory transferred by them, but has not ratified the covenant of the League of Nations embodied in the treaty of Versailles; and

Whereas the Government of the United States and the Government of France desire to reach a definite understanding with respect to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in Syria and the Lebanon;

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic have decided to conclude a convention to this effect and have nominated as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America.

His excellency, Mr. Myron T. Herrick, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States of America to France.

And the President of the French Republic:

M. Raymond Poincaré, senator, president of the council, minister of foreign affairs.

Who, after communicating to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by the French Republic, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of Syria and the Lebanon.

ARTICLE 2

The United States and its nationals shall have and enjoy all the rights and benefits secured under the terms of the mandate to members of the League of Nations and their nationals, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 3

Vested American property rights in the mandated territories shall be respected and in no way impaired.

ARTICLE 4

A duplicate of the annual report to be made by the mandatory under article 17 of the mandate shall be furnished to the United States.

ARTICLE 5

Subject to the provisions of any local laws for the maintenance of public order and public morals, the nationals of the United States will be permitted freely to establish and maintain educational, philanthropic, and religious institutions in the mandated territory, to receive voluntary applicants and to teach in the English language.

ARTICLE 6

Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited above unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States.

ARTICLE 7

The present convention shall be ratified in accordance with the respective constitutional methods of the high contracting parties. The ratifications shall be exchanged at Paris as soon as practicable. The present convention shall take effect on the date of the exchange of ratifications.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Paris the 4th day of April, in the year 1924.

[L. S.] (Signed) MYRON T. HERRICK.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, May 14, 1924

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Love Divine, keep us in the ways of Thy precepts lest we fail; lead us and shield us lest we falter. Great is our need, but greater far is Thy loving power. Remind us, O Lord, that no good thing dost Thou withhold from him who walks uprightly. In every way may we so value this life that we may realize that it is but an echo of the life eternal. This day may our thoughts be pure, our words clean, our labor wise and helpful. Forgive us if we are selfish; rebuke us if we are untrue; recall us if we go estray; and cleanse us from all secret faults. For Jesus's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Welch, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 381) to amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916 (39 Stat. L. p. 862).

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 6207) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to transfer to the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice all that portion of the Fort Leavenworth Military Reservation which lies in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 114) to vacate certain streets and alleys within the area known as the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia, and to authorize the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to its southern terminus south of Dahlia Street, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Butternut Street, and for other purposes, and asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and had appointed Mr. BALL, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. KING as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4445) to amend section 115 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The mesage also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1785. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, and for the protection of the people from empiricism in relation thereto," approved June 6, 1892, and acts amendatory thereof;

S. 2287. An act to permit the Secretary of War to dispose of and the Port of New York Authority to acquire the Hoboken Shore Line;

S. 2932. An act to quiet the title to lands within Pueblo Indian land grants, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 103. Joint resolution authorizing expenditure of the Fort Peck 4 per cent fund now standing to the credit of the Fort Peck Indians, of Montana, in the Treasury of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 4445) to amend section 115 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2287. An act to permit the Secretary of War to dispose of and the Port of New York Authority to acquire the Hoboken Shore Line; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1785. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, and for the protection of the people from empiricism in relation thereto," approved June 6, 1892, and acts amendatory thereof; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 2932. An act to quiet the title to lands within Pueblo Indian land grants, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. J. Res. 103. Joint resolution authorizing expenditure of the Fort Peck 4 per cent fund now standing to the credit of the Fort Peck Indians, of Montana, in the Treasury of the United States; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, this is Calendar Wednesday. I understand that there are scheduled about two hours of speeches on various subjects to-day, and inasmuch as the Committee on Military Affairs has a number of rather important bills—not great bills, but important to the service, both the National Guard and the Regular Army—I hope that there will be no extensions asked for further time on this day, which should be given to the consideration of bills from the Committee on Military Affairs.

INTERNATIONAL COURTS

The SPEAKER. By a special order the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] is entitled to address the House for 15 minutes.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to my request to speak on the international courts, where nations may settle disputes either by arbitration or judicial procedure.

First, I purpose to outline the history of the two courts, in order more clearly to emphasize my belief, that through the philosophy of progression a court can and will be established to meet the approval of all nations.

Arbitration was practiced among the ancients in the disposition of civil cases. The Permanent Court of Arbitration of modern times was established in 1899. Nicholas, the Czar of Russia, initiated the peace conference which was held in the city of The Hague in 1898, and at The Hague the court was instituted and there maintained its seat.

The United States was numbered with many signatory powers that ratified the court. The group created a list of 100 names, from which are selected three or five arbitrators to decide a dispute that may arise between its members. Each case has different arbitrators, "hence the impossibility of arriving at a jurisprudence capable of developing international law." The first case was arbitrated in 1902. It involved a question between the United States and Mexico relative to boundary lines of certain territory. The decision was accepted by both countries and thus the controversy ended in peace. The result interested Andrew Carnegie, which prompted him to offer to the commissioners of the court a fund to establish a law library. While the proffer was in abeyance, Mr. Carnegie advised that his gift of $1,500,000 be applied for the erection of a building to house the court in place of a library, and thus the "Carnegie Foundation" was realized, known as the Palace of Peace.

The issue as to the site was settled when the city of The Hague donated the Royal Park, a tract of 15 acres located in the heart of the city. Two hundred and sixteen competitive designs were submitted. The one adopted presented a building 160 feet long, of Norwegian granite, columns of gray stone, and stately towers, all of which mark the edifice with inspiring dignity.

By a resolution of the commissioners in the conference of 1907, all nations were privileged to present materials and objects of art. The city of The Hague gave the grand marble staircase; the United States, a group of statuary; England, stained glass windows; Japan, silk tapestry and furniture; France, paintings and Gobelins; other nations, rich pieces of decoration. A noted horticultural engineer beautifully laid out the grounds with ornamental lakes, fountains, perennial plants, rose and flower gardens. These, with a background of old and majestic trees, present a peaceful charm.

Attempt was made in the 1907 conference to establish with the Permanent Court of Arbitration a permanent court of arbitral justice, by electing judges for a stated term, drawing salaries, and being always ready to respond to the invitation of powers desiring to submit a difference to their judgment. This failed because the great and small powers were unable to agree upon a method of selecting the judges. After the armistice the League of Nations was created, from which eminated the Court of International Justice, which is also located in the Palace of Peace.

Article XIV of the league provides that the council shall formulate a plan for the establishment of the court, which was submitted to the league and adopted December 13, 1920. The council and the assembly, two organizations of the League of Nations, within their prescribed power, elected for a period of nine years, 11 acting and 4 deputy judges. The rules of the court relative to practice are similar to those of the Supreme Court of the United States. The nations submitting their differences must file an agreement with the registrar, that the decision of the court shall be the decision of the parties in suit. There is no appeal, but either contestant may file an application for revision. The session commences June 15 each year and ends when the calendar is cleared.

The court was formerly restricted to the members of the league. The rules, however, have been modified to admit every nation, and have been broadened to cover all international disputes.

The jurisdiction of the court was originally confined to—

(a) The interpretation of a treaty;

(b) Any question of international law;

(c) The existence of any fact, which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation; and

(d) The nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation.

The docket indicates a gradual increase of cases, and it is significant that not one has been entered in the court of arbitration since the organization of the court of justice.

The United States may appeal to the World Court for settlement of differences with other nations, but as the United States can not name the judges nor be assessed to maintain the court without membership, of course the United States would not submit issues to the court. Therefore, the question, Shall the United States become a member of the World Court? Membership would not draw the United States into the League of Nations, nor place it under obligation to accept its covenants.

Primitive man was governed by the unwritten law that permitted the stronger to prevail over the weaker, and "the strength of the arm won over the strength of the mind." The evolution of law marks the progress of civilization. As life of ease forges its way into human conduct, the desire for war gradually dies away in the advance stage of society, where the heart of man softens toward his fellow being.

One code of law can not be framed to apply to all nations, but one court can be organized to settle differences that may arise between nations. Habits of the peoples of the earth are growing similar, resulting from modern sciences by which thought may be quickly transmitted around the world and articulated sounds be waved across the Atlantic. Thus human society appeals for peace, public economy, higher morale, and legislation to be in accord with the age. People rebel against the enactment of new laws, as they are looked upon as taking away the common-law rights of liberty. Therefore we find opposition to the World Court. As an illustration, history relates a story that when Varus failed in his expedition to Germany, where Rome had enforced the laws of her country, a German warrior meeting one of the Roman jurists thrust a sword into his heart, saying: "Viper, hiss again if you can."

The International Court has been founded and it will remain. Under Article XIV of the covenant, the functions of the court are of a twofold nature—judicial and advisory. Its judicial functions are defined as follows:

> The court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it.

The advisory functions are founded upon the last phrase of the article.

> The court may also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to by the council or by the assembly.

It has required the age of man to perfect the civil tribunals as they are to-day. Courts with new jurisdiction, laws to neutralize the imperfections of old ones, and commissions are created almost daily throughout the world to meet the requirements of civilization and the density of population. The Court of International Justice has been established only since September, 1922, permanently, however, regardless of the opinion of political students to the contrary, and as its calendar becomes crowded new branches of the court will be ordained.

The method of electing judges, the objections that facts are not developed by a jury, and that the judges have or have not international interest in the disputes are questions that can be adjusted at the will of man, as similar ones have in the gradual formation of the civil tribunals. A nation that has not accepted the optional clause concerning the court's compulsory jurisdiction in disputes with another nation need not go to the World Court but to arms if preferable. The International Court of Justice is a stride forward. It will not eliminate wars to-morrow, but it will arrest the vigor for wars, which may in time bring universal peace. [Applause.]

REPEAL OF SECTION 15A OF THE TRANSPORTATION ACT

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I obtained leave last week to address the House for 30 minutes to-day to discuss railroad rate legislation, particularly the repeal of section 15a. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Further, I would like first to be permitted to proceed uninterrupted, and then later I shall be glad to answer questions.

I am glad to state to the House that we are at last to have hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on section 15a. The bill concerning which I am about to address you at this time has been for two years and four months pending before that committee, and so far no hearings have been ordered upon it. But this morning, the very morning when I am to address you on the bill, a resolution was passed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to have hearings on section 15a. The program of committee hearings on 15a does not in any way lessen the necessity for filing the discharge petition at the Clerk's desk. We need not hope because hearings are to be held, we will get a chance to vote upon the repeal of section 15a, because of any action by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The hearings do not mean that we are to have a favorable report on the bill from the committee. I do not believe that the membership of the House believes that as that committee is now organized we shall receive a favorable report on the bill. The fact that hearings will be had does not mean that the bill will be favorably reported by the House committee, and the bill will not be considered in the House without a rule from the Committee on Rules, and the membership of the House knows that we can not receive a favorable report on the bill from the Committee on Rules of this Congress.

This is the most important measure the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has before it upon the question of railroad rate reduction. I hope we may have consideration of it in the House before this Congress adjourns.

On May 7 I filed a motion in writing, as required by the rules of the House, to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from further jurisdiction of H. R. 5427, and asking for its immediate consideration by the House. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. It provides for the repeal of section 15a of the interstate commerce act and declares unlawful advances in rates, fares, and charges authorized after the passage of the transportation act, which includes section 15a.

The transportation act was approved February 28, 1920.

The bill H. R. 5427 was first introduced by Mr. HUDDLESTON in the Sixty-seventh Congress and was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and remained there during the Sixty-seventh Congress and has been resting peacefully in possession of that committee along with many other bills relating to transportation problems.

It is evident to everyone at all familiar with the situation confronting this House at this time that if there is to be any action by this Congress upon the question of railroad rate legislation it requires immediate action and consideration to be effective.

It is the recognized intention of those who control the program of this Congress to adjourn some time next month.

So those who are favorable to this legislation find themselves confronted with the situation that they must endeavor to secure action through a motion to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or this session of Congress will end without attempting to grant any relief to the great basic industries that are suffering because of excessive transportation charges.

This is the first effort made in this Congress to secure relief from the excessive freight charges which have become an unbearable burden upon the basic industries of the country and more especially destructive to agricultural prosperity.

Section 15a is that portion of the transportation act which has received the most severe and constant criticism of any section of the bill. This section contains nearly all the evils which have brought public condemnation upon the so-called Esch-Cummins law. Section 15a was not in the transportation act of 1920 when that bill first passed the House.

It was forced upon the House from the conference committee and by reason of its addition to the measure many Members then refused to support it who had been favorable to the bill before.

There have been numerous bills introduced in this Congress for the repeal of section 15a itself or declaring unlawful the rates which have been established because of its provision and since its enactment.

As showing the strong demand for the repeal of section 15a and the wide opposition to it from different sections of the country, I want to read a list of the bills introduced in this session of Congress for the repeal or radical modification of this section of the transportation act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, a recognized leader both of his party and of the Congress, and a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, has introduced a bill to repeal section 15a.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Nebraska has introduced a bill for the repeal of the entire transportation act of 1920, which includes 15a, so his bill also includes the section referred to in the Huddleston bill.

Mr. TILLMAN, of Arkansas, has introduced a bill to amend section 15a, making unlawful the advance in freight rates ordered after its approval.

Mr. VINSON, of Georgia, has introduced a bill amending section 15a, making unlawful the rates and charges ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission under section 15a.

I also introduced a bill for the repeal of section 15a and section 19a, and that bill was referred to the Commerce Committee.

Mr. HUDDLESTON, of Alabama, introduced, on the 14th of January last, the bill which I have petitioned to have taken from the committee and immediately considered by the House.

This is a larger number of bills than have been introduced concerning any other one transportation question before the American Congress. Section 15a should be repealed for the reason that it contains fundamental provisions that are wholly wrong in public policy, both as to principles and practices.

First, it provides a cost-plus plan for determining the rates which the carriers shall be allowed to charge the public. It in effect commands the Interstate Commerce Commission to make rates high enough to earn 5½ per cent net upon all railroad property above the reported operating expenses, without regard to any other consideration.

The authorized per cent which the railroads are permitted to earn is 5½ per cent upon the determined value of all the railroads. Commissioner Esch, in hearings before the House Commerce Committee, stated that such a rule for fixing a fair return inevitably resulted in many railroads earning incomes far in excess of what any court would declare or permit as a just return upon the capital invested.

Section 15a makes the rule to determine the fairness of a rate the matter of the cost of the service alone, instead of also including the value of the service rendered and its effect upon the commerce of the Nation.

Section 15a makes it lawful for the principal railroad systems of the country, which carry the vast volume of traffic of the Nation, to tax the people through excessive freight rates and earn enormous and unfair percentages and profits.

This provision of the law is excused as necessary in order that poorly managed or weak and failing railroads may earn a profit in spite of all just economic law. The principle is unreasonable, unsound, and can not be justified under any of the recognized rules of economic justice or decisions of our courts prior to the enactment of this law.

The absolute unfairness and injustice of this rule was so apparent that the recapture clause was incorporated in the section while the bill was in conference. This clause provides that only one-half of the excessive and unfair rates which are taken from the people shall be retained by the railroads; the other part of the unfair earnings of the carriers is to be turned over to the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon the supposition that it may be used for the rehabilitation of railroads that are trying to keep out of the hands of receivers or courts of bankruptcy.

The recapture clause is as unfair in practice and principle as though a bank were permitted by law to charge its borrowers who were solvent and prompt in payment any usurious rate, no matter how high, in order that the bank might make good its losses upon its loans made to other borrowers who were insolvent or refused to pay.

Before the enactment of the transportation act including section 15a the courts had held that if it could be shown that a carrier was earning an unfair percentage of income upon its property investment because of excessive rates and charges the public was entitled to have such charges reduced sufficiently to leave the carrier only a just return.

Under that construction the unfair rates that the public is now compelled to pay to the railroads that carry the great bulk of the Nation's traffic would not be permitted by the courts. But section 15a makes injustice lawful.

Section 15a in paragraph 17 provides that no shipper shall be entitled to recover from the carrier upon the sole ground that any rate shall reflect a proportion of excess income to the carrier if a portion of the excessive charges is paid to the commission in the public interest under the provisions of this section.

In other words, if the percentage of earnings of a carrier is 20 per cent or 30 per cent, under the present law, the public is estopped from the plea that the rate is unjust and excessive since one-half of the robbery is to be paid to the Interstate Commerce Commission for its disposal.

The people of Nebraska or Iowa or Pennsylvania or any other State may be required to pay a rate that returns excessive and unfair profit to the carrier in those States, but they must endure the injustice because some bankrupt railroad in another State can be bolstered up by money taken from the pockets of the people of another Commonwealth.

It is because of the unfair and revolutionary provisions contained in section 15a, a few of which I have mentioned, that there has arisen a tremendous demand on the part of both producers and consumers from every quarter of the Nation insisting upon its repeal.

It was forced upon the House by the power of special interests fighting behind the prestige of a conference report, and the House should repeal it now that it knows the results of its unfair provisions.

It hog ties the Interstate Commerce Commission by its provisions so that it is no longer free to determine what are just and fair rates both to the public and the carrier.

The commission must base the rate of return only upon the cost to the carrier without regard to the value of the service rendered or its effect upon the price of commodities or the other business interests of the Nation.

Under the mandate of 15a the Interstate Commerce Commission advanced railroad rates and charges so enormously that as a result commerce between the States is halted, all basic industries are declining, and agriculture is suffering as it has never suffered before.

The prospect of the soft-coal industry for the future is as black as the coal itself. The public refuses to buy coal because freight rates make the price prohibitive. As a consequence, the coal is piled up at the mine's mouth for the lack of markets and labor in the soft-coal regions is idle or working for short periods and at reduced wages.

Prices of all basic commodities are affected adversely because of unreasonable transportation charges. Profitable agriculture is rapidly being destroyed, and the farming regions of the West and Middle West are suffering more acutely at this time than any other section of the Republic.

But the contagion of bankruptcy brought on by the stagnation and destruction of the farming industry is creeping nearer and nearer to the States in the prosperous East that have yet escaped the blasting influences that followed from section 15a. But even the prosperous East is bound to suffer from its blighting effects sooner or later.

Commissioner Esch in a statement to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House states that in the eastern section railroad charges were 211 per cent above prewar charges.

Every day word is brought from the great agricultural valleys of the West that business conditions are becoming more and more unendurable. The people out there have lived up the profits they accumulated in happier times. When that condition comes to you in the East you will feel what the West has had so long to endure.

Because of the provisions of section 15a the Interstate Commerce Commission enormously advanced freight rates, effective August 26, 1920. In all the years prior to 1917 only once did the commission grant a general increase of railroad freight rates and that was only an advance of 5 per cent to the roads in one section of the country.

Yet in 1916 the railroads of the Nation earned a net return of over 6 per cent upon their total valuation. That was before the cost-plus plan of figuring net returns was authorized and inaugurated under section 15a of the Esch-Cummins law.

In 1917 an advance of 15 per cent was allowed to the railroads in the eastern division. In 1918 the Director of Railroads, Mr. McAdoo, advanced freight rates on all railroads under his control 25 per cent additional to that of 1917.

March 1, 1920, the railroads were returned to private control. On that date section 15a began to operate, and railroad operating expenses for the year 1920 showed an increase over that of 1919 of $1,406,755,525.

Under the provisions of section 15a the public were required to pay this enormous increase in expenses before the railroads would show any net earnings. The cost-plus plan of figuring profits nearly bankrupted the Government during the war, and the cost-plus plan of determining railroad income and rates has about bankrupted the producers and consumers of America.

The increase in freight rates granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the carriers, effective August 26, 1920, amounted to from 25 to 40 per cent above those already in effect when the railroads were returned to private control.

The amount of the increase as stated by the Interstate Commerce Commission was $1,528,000,000 per annum. Complaints became so loud because of this new burden put upon the public that a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent was ordered by the commission in 1922.

There have also been some reductions in rates upon wheat, coarse grains, and livestock, which were granted for the relief of agriculture in certain sections. But there still remain in force increases in rates under the order of August 26, 1920, above those in force prior to that order in an amount in excess of $1,000,000,000 per annum because of the requirements of section 15a.

Section 2 of the Huddleston bill provides that the rates and charges made effective since and including August 26, 1920, are declared unlawful. It is because of this provision of section 2 that I selected this bill as the one that would bring real and immediate relief to the producers and consumers of the country if enacted into law.

The repeal of section 15a is a consummation devoutly to be wished. But such action is useless unless its repeal is followed by resulting relief. The repeal of the section should be followed by setting aside the rate advances which the act compelled the Interstate Commerce Commission to allow. That is just what the Huddleston bill provides for.

Discussing the Hoch bill for readjustment of railroad rates, Commissioner Esch said:

> The problem, of course, arises out of the command to the Interstate Commerce Commission under the transportation act to so arrange schedules, rates, fares, and charges as with honest, economical, and efficient management would produce 5½ per cent net upon the aggregate value of the carriers properly devoted to public use.

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has reported out the Hoch bill. That is a bill providing for an investigation in order to find out if we can not discover some way to relieve basic industries from unfair rates; but, gentlemen, I have little faith in investigations. I have generally found that when we want to stall upon something in Washington or want to put off action we call for an investigation. We had Commissioner Esch before us, as well as the director of traffic of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in reply to an inquiry Commissioner Esch said that the investigation asked for in Mr. Hoch's bill would, in his judgment, take 10 years before it could be brought to a conclusion. Gentlemen, I do not expect to be here 10 years from now, so I would like to have some action upon this grave question before 10 years. [Applause.] Furthermore, gentlemen, I have found out that if you refer something to a commission for investigation and you give the commission plenty of money that commission will hold hearings until the money runs out. If I had my way, I would put over the doors of all these investigating committees empowered to investigate grave questions the same sign which Dante said he saw over the door to the inferno, "All hope abandon, ye who enter here." [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman does not contend that the resolution which I introduced is limited to an investigation, does he?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; I do not contend that.

Mr. HOCH. Does it not direct that these maladjustments be corrected?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It does.

Mr. HOCH. And is it not also true that the witness to whom the gentleman has referred did say that it might possibly take 10 years, but that subsequently he modified that statement by saying it might be possible to go through an entire survey of the freight structures and some relief given in the near future? Is not that true?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I agree with that. But the whole trend of the commissioner's testimony was that the bill which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] has introduced does not give any new power to the commission which the commission does not already have, but that it simply instructs them to hold an investigation, while I want some change in the law which controls and affects the commission's actions.

If the bill I am asking to be considered is enacted into law, it will result in an immediate reduction of at least $1,000,000,000 in freight charges. The provisions of the bill are so plain and easily understood that he who runs may read and understand them.

We made a fight last week for the enactment of a bill that will protect the interests and secure the rights of labor. What excuse can Members of this House offer to the producers and consumers of the Nation, who are suffering more at this time than any other class, if we do not invoke the same rule and make a fight for them?

Labor is organized and therefore is armed and prepared to fight for its rights. The farmer and the consuming public are not organized as they should be to secure their just rights from Congress. But I think we will find them organized at the polls in November, and they will hold every Member of this House responsible if they do not make a fight for them here and now, and they ought to do so.

It will not avail any Member to say he did not sign the petition because he did not understand the purposes and provisions of the bill. They are as plain as day and as certain as fate if enacted into law.

It is futile for Members to try to excuse themselves by saying it is too late to secure the passage of the bill at this session. We can still pass the bill if a majority are here who desire to do it, and we can not determine that unless we bring the matter to the test.

No Member can fairly claim that he is in favor of reducing railroad rates and charges and withhold his signature from the petition now upon the Clerk's desk. We can no longer dodge a great question since the adoption of the discharge rule.

The line is very clearly drawn, and all must take their stand upon one side or the other. The basic producers and the consuming public are all going to know where we stand upon the matter of securing relief from excessive railroad rates and charges.

Unless we revoke the rule of law established under section 15a the present high freight rates will remain in force, no matter how tremendous the fall in the value of commodities. Agriculture already has suffered such a decline in prices that the present freight rates are confiscatory.

Reduction of freight and passenger rates to a lower and more just level does not necessarily mean that the carriers shall therefore earn a smaller net annual income. The railroads must shape their business policy toward increasing the volume of transportation traffic rather than that of increasing charges upon a lesser or diminishing volume of freight business.

Labor costs will not trouble the railroad managers any more than they trouble Henry Ford if they will use the same sound principles of business management by which Mr. Ford has built up the greatest industrial property in the world.

American workmen are the highest-paid labor in the world. But America also dominates the world's markets with her products of mass production because American labor is the most efficient and economical, measured by the cost of production, of any labor in the world.

The bill is not revolutionary, nor does it involve any unfair or new principle of determining what shall constitute a fair railroad return.

The bill does not take away any power which the Interstate Commerce Commission now has. It only relieves them from the restrictions and obligations that section 15a has imposed upon them.

It leaves to the carriers all the advances that were granted to them before the war and during the war as war measures. It empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission to so adjust railroad rates, fares, and charges as they shall find to be just, reasonable, and in conformity with the value of the service rendered.

Members of Congress will find it difficult to convince their constituents that these terms and provisions are not fair and reasonable as to the public, the producer, the consumer, and the railroads.

Mr. Speaker, we have by law constituted the railroad systems of the Nation a great private monopoly. We then created the Interstate Commerce Commission as an instrumentality of the Government to protect the people from injustice and oppression by this nation-wide transportation monopoly.

But the transportation act has changed the powers of that commission into an instrument behind which and by whose order the railroad monopoly is permitted to prey upon the public, which it was before designed to protect.

The bill that I am asking to be considered will again put the Interstate Commerce Commission in a position to protect the public from charges and injustices that have become intolerable and indefensible. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman think that Congress would have the power, without an investigation and without hearings, to wipe off the schedule of rates now in force and declare excessive any rates greater than those which were in force on August 25, 1920?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; I think Congress certainly has that power. I had that particular proposition put up to me when I was making my race for Governor of Nebraska, on the question of reducing passenger fares in Nebraska from 3 cents a mile to 2 cents a mile. The argument was made by those who opposed that action by legislative enactment, which is what I propose here, that it would not be sustained by the courts. I was charged then with not being a lawyer and advocating something unlawful; and, of course, I know that my questioner, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, is a good lawyer. The Republican papers said, "You can lock that fellow from the short-grass country up in a room, give him paper and pen and ink and leave him there for a week, and he can not draft a law which will stand the test of the courts, nor the attacks of the learned lawyers the railroads will employ." My answer was, being a Democrat I was not expected to spell big words, but that I could read words of one syllable; that if I were empowered to write such a law I would hunt around in the present law—which declared the maximum fare that the people of Nebraska would be required to pay was 3 cents per mile—and I would scratch out the word "three" and write in the word "two," and reenact the law; and I said I believed that the law would stand the test of the courts. Now, that is what we are in substance seeking to do here. We are striking out the excessive rates ordered because of the present law by declaring them unlawful. It may be interesting to you to know that we finally passed the 2-cent passenger fare law in Nebraska and put it upon the statute books. The committee that drafted the law in the legislature was composed of a number of distinguished lawyers like my friend from Chicago [Mr. CHINDBLOM]. They spent a month trying to draft a bill different in language from the one I had advocated, but finally they threw away all the bills the lawyers had drawn; they hunted around in the old act until they found the word "three," they scratched it out and wrote in the word "two," and reenacted it into law. It stood the test of the courts, and it gave the people of Nebraska the right to ride on the railroads at 2 cents for 11 years.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How long ago was that?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That was in 1907, but the rate stood for 11 years. Mr. McAdoo first raised it to 3 cents during Government control of the railroads, and then under the Esch-Cummins law passenger fares were advanced to 3.6 cents per mile.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman contend that a rate that was reasonable in 1907 or that was reasonable in 1920 is necessarily reasonable in 1924?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; and this bill does not provide that. It simply provides that we shall declare unlawful the rates and advances made since the adoption of section 15a if we repeal the section. Section 2 of the bill I am advocating gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to decide the very thing that the gentleman wants to have decided by it; but I want them to be free to act and not bound down and hog tied by this particular section of the transportation act.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But we would be establishing rates by legislative enactment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We are seeking to establish the fact that certain rates are unlawful and authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine by another rule the rates that the railroads may lawfully charge the public.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But in the meantime the old rates will be in force.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; they would not be in force, because I take it the Interstate Commerce Commission will obey the mandates of Congress, which would make them unlawful.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They will have to take time to have hearings on the question of the rates.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There will be plenty of time to do that before we get this bill enacted into law; I know that.

The Huddleston bill (H. R. 5427) is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5427) to repeal section 15a of the interstate commerce act and to restore rates, fares, and charges authorized prior to increases effective August 26, 1920

Be it enacted, etc., That section 15a of the interstate commerce act be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That hereafter all charges, rates, and fares of carriers subject to the interstate commerce act greater than were in force on August 25, 1920, shall be unlawful: Provided, That this act shall not operate to increase any rate, fare, or charge above what same was prior to its passage: Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall hereafter have authority to change any particular rule, rate, fare, or charge which may be found not to be just, reasonable, and in conformity with the value of the service rendered.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER], not because I am opposed to considering legislation upon this subject, but because of my belief that the bill he is supporting would deal with one of the most delicate and vital economic problems of America in a ruthless and in a destructive way.

The bill which he supports proposes to do two things, fundamentally. The first is to repeal section 15a. Section 15a of the interstate commerce act has 18 subdivisions. They deal with three or four important elements of our transportation problem.

In the first place it is that section of the law which defines the rules of rate making. It defines the basis of railroad charges against freight and passenger traffic. It is the provision that is responsible for the change from the old rule of "reasonable return" to the rule of the transportation act which is that of a "fair return" upon the aggregate value of the property involved.

I agree with the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] that as a matter of principle the fair-return principle is objectionable. That was one of the reasons I voted against the transportation act. In my judgment that rule includes as elements of value charges which should not be placed against the shippers of the country. However, the question at this hour as to whether or not we shall change that principle is practically an abstract one. A repeal of that rule at this time would give no promise of practical benefits of value in any reasonable time. The abstract definition of the rule of rate making in the United States is not of immediate practical importance.

Section 15a also established the group system of rate making, which this bill would abolish. The group system of rate making is based on the candid admission that we have what are called "weak sister" railroads in this country that can not survive against open competition. Due to unsuccessful management or improvident investment at the beginning, they can not in competition with the efficient and successful road make a return that is sufficient to maintain themselves and serve the great communities where they operate. The group-rate system takes care of this situation.

In considering this question of the group system of rate making which this bill would so ruthlessly wipe from our transportation system I ask you to consider this point: There are many of these weak roads in this country that are to-day giving reasonably satisfactory service only because they are furnished this crutch by the transportation act. The group system of rate making deserves most careful consideration.

Section 15a contains the recapture clause. We frankly admit that when we make the rate high enough to sustain the weak roads we are compelled to fix a rate that gives an excessive return to the efficient and prosperous roads. As a means of taking care of that excess payment by the shippers of the United States the recapture clause provides that half of the income of carriers in excess of 6 per cent shall be paid to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the United States, to be used for certain specified purposes in aid of railroad equipment.

This bill would wipe out the recapture clause without providing what shall be done with the funds. At the present time something over $3,000,000 has been paid into the revolving recapture fund for the Goverament. The Supreme Court has recently held that provision constitutional. The Interstate Commerce Commission is now engaged in an effort to enforce it.

Another feature of section 15a provides that this fund of the Interstate Commerce Commission may be loaned to the railroads or it may use the fund to buy equipment which may be rented to the railroads. This feature also will be wiped out by this legislation.

Realizing how important section 15a, embodying these features, is to the transportation system of the United States, nevertheless that section is a minor consideration as compared with the second thing which this bill proposes to do, so far as immediate practical results are concerned.

The second purpose attempted to be accomplished by this bill is to provide that all rates and fares greater than those in existence on the 25th day of August, 1920, shall, by the enactment of this bill, be wiped off the books.

Any raise made subsequent to that time, regardless of how meritorious or how necessary it may be, is absolutely, by congressional action, wiped off the slate. The well-settled plan of railroad regulation adopted in this country is by a regulatory body—the Interstate Commerce Commission. Nobody has ever contended it was practical or possible for Congress to write the railroad rates from the floor of this House, yet the method proposed here would, in a few sentences, wipe the Interstate Commerce Commission out of the picture, and we would attempt to write railroad rates from this floor. We would make the wise use of its powers impossible without being able to do the work we made impossible for them.

Now, what is the result as a practical thing, and that is what we are interested in after all, and not the theory of it? This bill, if it became a law, would reduce the freight income of the railroads of the United States 12.81 per cent. More than $1 out of every $8 that the railroads are now receiving from freight would be taken away from them by one sentence of this bill when written into law. In addition to that the bill would take away from the railroads 15.86 per cent of the fares the railroads now collect. Now, to go a little further into what that means. In 1923 the railroads had a net operating income of $977,000,000. This bill would take out of that $977,000,000 $774,000,000. Is there anybody that can defend this bill for one moment when they realize that $4 out of $5 of net operating returns of the railroads of the United States would be taken from them by this bill? Does that mean anything but destruction, chaos, and discouragement? That would leave the railroads of the United States an income out of their net operating income of only $203,000,000, which is less than the railroads have received in any year for many years past, even in the lean and most unfortunate years.

If you add to the $203,000,000 the nonoperating income, you would have a gross income of $460,000,000. Deduct from that interest and rentals which the railroads are paying and you would have an annual deficiency of $186,000,000 by writing this bill into law.

Let us get the background of the picture behind this legislation. In 1918 we took over the railroads into Federal control. The railroads were in bad condition. In 1918 the director of the railroads made a flat increase of freight rates of 25 per cent. The result was that the increased operating revenues of the railroads in 1919 amounted to $1,130,000,000. Following that action during Federal control the additional cost of operating the railroads was $1,548,000,000, or a total expense increase after the raise that the Federal administration made of $418,000,000.

During Federal control we were in effect subsidizing the railroads at the expense of the Federal Government. That became necessary to serve our war purposes. Outside of that subsidization they were in an insolvent condition. Out of the Treasury of the United States we gave the railroads a standard return, paying them $718,000,000.

Now to contrast the working conditions under Federal control with the present. If during the Federal control we had paid for the transportation of freight during that period the same rates that we were paying in March, 1923, the shippers and passengers of the United States would have paid the railroads $2,468,000,000 more than they did pay during the Federal control period. In other words, while the Federal control during the period of control cost the United States a billion and a quarter dollars, the higher freight rates following private operation were twice that amount, or $2,468,000,000, for the same amount of traffic.

What is the position since Federal control as to the financial condition of the railroads?

The operating revenue under the administration of the railroads since Federal control in 1919 has increased $1,172,000,000. The operating expenses have increased $524,000,000, making a net increase in the income over expenses of $648,000,000. The total increased expense has been $711,000,000, leaving a net revenue increase in 1923, as compared with 1919, of $462,000,000.

In 1920 we adopted the transportation act with the idea of giving the United States an adequate, self-supporting transportation system. We adopted the fair-return standard and the group system of rate making. In July, 1920, the Labor Board ordered an increase in the wages of labor of $618,000,000. The amount of the raise paid labor alone was greater than the total net operating income of the railroads in 1919. In order to produce the fair return and meet all the additional charges, the Interstate Commerce Commission divided the country into groups, as it had been authorized to do, and it made these raises of August 26, 1920. In the eastern division freight rates were raised 40 per cent; southern, 25; western, 35; and the mountain and Pacific, 25. Then what followed? All the country knows of the business depression. It so happened that with the raise in the railroad rates came a slump in prices, particularly the slump in the price of farm products. Then we had the worst conditions we could have in reference to transportation charges on industry. In 1921 there was a decrease in the volume of freight in the country of 25 per cent. The result was that the transportation act failed to make that fair return which the Interstate Commerce Commission had determined was necessary. Then, in 1921, reductions in rates began to be made. The Labor Board in 1921 and 1922 made a labor reduction of $450,000,000, with the result that in 1923 the total received by labor of the railroads was reduced to $161,000,000 above what it was during Federal control in 1919.

Beginning in 1921, there followed a series of piecemeal reductions in freight rates. I will not attempt to enumerate. Finally, on the 1st of July, 1922, the commission made an order that reduced freight rates approximately $1,000,000,000 in addition to all other reductions which had been made. It reduced the eastern rates 14 per cent, the western 13½ per cent, the southern, the mountain, and the Pacific 12½ per cent.

Incidentally, I would like to call attention to the proportionate effect upon some products of agriculture. The revenue that wheat, corn, and all grain gives to the railroads of the United States is less than 7 per cent of their income. The income on cattle, sheep, and hogs is less than 3 per cent of the revenue of the railroads of the United States. I do not say that with the idea of minimizing the importance of wheat, corn, cattle, sheep, and hogs, but to show its relation to the railroad schedules of the United States. Many of those reductions, in fact most of the reductions in 1921 and 1922, were established with the intention of relieving the agricultural situation.

Now, what is the proposition to-day? The net operating revenue in 1923, the most successful year since 1916, was $977,000,000, or an average of 5.02 per cent upon the estimated value of the railroad property. The cost of transportation for 1923 as compared with 1913 index figures is 154. The index number for all commodity wholesale articles was 150. The index figure of some of the great agricultural products in the United States is materially less than the index figure for freight transportation.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman refers to the retail market, does he not, when he makes that statement?

Mr. LEA of California. All commodity prices.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is wholesale.

Mr. LEA of California. Yes; all commodity prices.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The wholesale agricultural price of farm commodities is far below the freight.

Mr. LEA of California. For some products, yes.

I would like to take a little broader view of this question. What is the transportation problem of the United States? The laboring man may say it is a question of higher wages between employee and employer. The stockholder may think it is a question of how much dividends he is going to get. The bondholder thinks it is a question of the interest on bonds. The shipper thinks it is a question of getting lower freight rates. The transportation problem of the United States is not that. It is all that and much more. These things are only incidental. The great transportation problem of the United States is the problem of America, one of her greatest and most vital problems. There is nothing more vital to the prosperity and the advancement of the United States than an efficient and economical transportation system.

We have in the United States 250,000 miles of railroads. Their length is sufficient to reach 10 times around the earth. It is sufficient to reach 80 times across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific. These carriers have freight cars sufficient to make six solid trains across the continent, consisting of 2,400,000 freight cars. The railroads represent an estimated investment of $19,000,000,000. They owe over $11,000,000,000. They employ 1,700,000 men.

They are the essential connecting link between the producer and the consumer. The farmer and the manufacturer depend upon them for an outlet for their products. The consumer depends on them for his supplies. The cost of transportation is part of every pound of food, clothing, and material purchased by the American consumer.

Look at the map of the United States. The Mississippi Valley, the great Central West, is the greatest producer of tonnage on this earth. Beyond the Rockies is our Pacific coast. We are dependent upon the railroad for many of our supplies, and it is by means of the railroad that we place our products in the centers of population, in the East, and in foreign markets. The relation of transportation to economic efficiency is probably more vital in the United States than in any other country in the world. We are the biggest consuming Nation; we have the greatest volume to transport; we have the greatest productive areas to be served by our railroads.

What have the American people a right to demand of their transportation system? The public of the United States have a right to two things—efficient service and reasonable charges. The present service is, at least, reasonably efficient. The question of securing more reasonable charges involves many considerations. At the present time it involves the question as to what should be the rule of rate making. Should we maintain the present rule, providing for a fair return on the aggregate value of the property held and used by the carrier in the service of transportation, or should we return to the old rule that rates must be reasonable? The "fair return" rule considers, primarily, the interest of the carrier and largely ignores inflated values or improvident investments in railroad properties.

The question of securing reasonable charges also involves the method and justice of the system of valuation of the properties of the carriers and also the wisdom of the group system of rate making. In addition to this, efficient supervision or regulation of railway expenses is necessary to protect the public by preventing unwarranted expenses of various kinds being charged to expense accounts.

Congress can define the rule of rate making. It can prescribe the general principles to be followed in the valuation of railroads. It can determine the wisdom of maintaining, modifying, or repealing the present law, providing for the the group system of rate making. But the successful administration of all these features that most intimately affect the ultimate question as to whether or not we are going to secure reasonable rates depends upon the administration of the law by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

A slight knowledge of the duties and responsibilities of the Interstate Commerce Commission will convince anyone that its members have a very important and a very burdensome task, one that requires ability, patience, and great skill. Our transportation system is so great and so widespread in its ramifications that our rate structure must be handled with ability, courage, and skill.

From the standpoint of the investor in railroad properties, and ultimately from the standpoint of the people of the country, a reasonable return is essential to efficient service and reasonable transportation charges. We necessarily exercise regulatory power over railroad rates. We deny the railroad investor the right that we grant to other investors, to make unlimited profits for his capital. Depriving him of the advantage and attraction of an investment that may bring excessive returns, we must, in part at least, provide the advantage of a fairly certain return, though moderate in amount. The railroads of the country, as a whole, can neither give efficient service nor at reasonable rates unless they be maintained as going concerns on a profit-making basis. Without profits there is no inducement to the investor; there is no opportunity for betterments or expansion. The inevitable consequence of nonprofitable railroad property is poor service, deteriorating equipment, and excessive charges.

We might unreasonably cut down the revenue of the railroads and secure a continuance of satisfactory service temporarily, but our satisfaction from such a source would be temporary and ill-advised. The shipper needs cars, service, and promptness. The traveler needs comfort, safety, and reliability. These are advantages that come from going concerns and not from insolvent concerns.

Our transportation problem is yet in an uncertain stage. There are only three possible plans. We are going to have a nonregulated railroad, public ownership, or the present system of regulation. The nonregulated railroad has passed forever and will not again be the subject of practical consideration. Public ownership of railroads gives the advantage of unification of control and unified use and operation of facilities. It gives the advantage that would come from the unearned increment going to the public instead of the owners of railroad properties. Government ownership during the last 60 years would have given this advantage, inasmuch as many railroad properties have increased materially, due to increase of population and the railroad traffic that accrued.

However, so far no one has suggested any plan by which we could have Government ownership free of politics. The railroads will shortly have 2,000,000 employees. These men might easily be primarily interested in the political life of the Nation on questions concerning their own compensation and conditions of employment. No plan is known by which, with a popular government, we could free the management and operation of railroads from political influence of appalling consequences. Without a certainty of separation of government from railroads and politics I could not reconcile myself to Government ownership.

In the next few years we may be in the final test of our present system of regulation. The country must be confident that it can get efficient service at reasonable cost under the present system or it will probably turn to Government ownership, as undesirable as that appears to be. Has this popular form of government the ability, courage, and the skill necessary to properly control and regulate our great transportation system, assuring us efficiency and economy? We commit much of that problem to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Its success or its failure is closely related to the economic and political welfare of the future decades of our country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEA of California. I ask the privilege of revising and extending my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] under order of the House is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, you have already heard two excellent speakers on this railroad subject. I appreciate that it is a rather technical subject, and perhaps you are not in a mood to hear further about it, but I offer in justification for taking any time of the House now the very great importance of the matter involved in the motion filed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER]. I want, if I may, simply to supplement what the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has said, and to call your attention to what seems to me to be the high points in the proposition that is involved in this motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of this bill, H. R. 5427, and bring that bill up on the floor of the House for action here upon the floor without hearings and without full knowledge of the facts. Now, this bill has two sections. The first section is a flat, unconditional repeal of section 15a. The second section automatically restores all freight rates that were in effect in this country at the close of Federal control. Now, I want to say a word or two in reference to the first—probably I may duplicate, but I shall endeavor not to do that—the repeal of section 15a. This section 15a contains two major propositions. The first one is the so-called rule of rate making. The second one of those propositions, which a good many people I find in this country do not know is included in section 15a, is a provision for the so-called recapture of excess earnings. Now, in reference to the rule of rate making, I will say to you frankly I have never agreed that as an economic principle the rule of rate making laid down in section 15a is sound, although I realize there are very plausible arguments in its support. Upon countless occasions I have voiced my objection in committee and outside committee with reference to the rule of rate making involved in section 15a.

I am sorry that there is not time now, and that this is not the place to go into a technical discussion of that rule of rate making; but let me say again that that rule of rate making is not a governmental guaranty. In fact, there has not been an act of Congress passed since I have been a Member of this House that has been so grossly misrepresented from one end of the country to the other as the act containing that rule laid down in section 15a. It is not a guaranty. Not a dollar has ever been paid or ever will be paid out of the American Treasury as a guaranty under section 15a.

Mr. CARTER. What is the difference to the people between having it paid out of the Treasury and paid by the people?

Mr. HOCH. The Interstate Commerce Commission is required to fix rates which, under honest, efficient, and economical administration—to quote the statute—will, in their judgment, earn a reasonable return on the investment. Certainly no one wants to deny the roads, under honest management and honest valuation, the opportunity to make a fair return, because obviously we can not maintain the railroads without that fair return. But if the railroad does not earn a fair return—and even in the last year, which was the most prosperous year to the roads since the act went into effect, they earned, the railroads as a whole, 5.2 per cent—there is no guaranty. Many roads have earned only 1 per cent or 2 per cent, and some have had no net earnings. No dollar has ever been taken out of the Treasury in any way to make up the 6 per cent to these roads, so that it is not a guaranty, and no claim has ever been made by a railroad that it is a guaranty, and no claim has ever been made upon the Government for a return on that basis. There is a considerable difference between a guaranty, under which a deficiency in revenues would be made up by the Government, and this provision, under which the Government or the people do not make up the deficiency and the railroads must bear it themselves.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman in charge of the bill, Mr. Esch, admitted that it was a guaranty when he brought the bill into the House.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It is not a guaranty in any ordinary use of that term. And I say that, although, as I have said, I do not subscribe to the soundness of the provision. It is true that there was a guaranty in the railroad law previous to that. I do not say this as a partisan matter. Gentlemen will agree with me when I say that I seldom discuss partisan matters on this floor. But President Wilson when he took over the railroads put in a declaration for an actual guaranty to the railroads of a standard return for three years—and those years had been prosperous years for most railroads—and the Congress followed with the Federal control act, which continued and ratified that standard return. The transportation act passed by a Republican Congress continued that standard return for six months.

Personally I may say—although I perhaps ought not to stop to indulge in personal references—I was not a Member of Congress when the Federal control act was passed; but when the transportation act was passed we had a separate vote on the six months' extension of that guaranty, and I voted against it and have always been opposed to it. Under that guaranty there was paid directly out of the Federal Treasury for the 26 months of Federal control close to $2,000,000,000 as an actual guaranty, and those who misrepresent the transportation act of 1920 by calling it a guaranty should remember that there was an actual guaranty under the Democratic administration under which the operating expenses of the railroads were increased to a high level and no adequate increase of transportation charges were made to take care of that increase, and then they turned around and made up the deficiency out of the Federal Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. I can not yield; I am sorry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HOCH. Now, then, so much for the rule of rate making. I would like to go into it further if I had the time, to show my objection to it. The second part of section 15a is this provision as to the recapture of excess earnings. That is a very debatable subject as a matter of governmental policy. I realize that. But certainly I would not want to vote for a flat, unconditional repeal of the recapture clause, which does take at least from these prosperous roads a part of their excess earnings for the benefit of transportation as a whole in this country.

I am surprised that anybody should come here and propose a flat, unconditional repeal of that part of section 15a which compels the prosperous roads to surrender half of their excess earnings.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman will remember that the prosperous roads made a vigorous fight against this recapture clause.

Mr. HOCH. Yes. The prosperous railroads made a vigorous fight, as the gentleman from Illinois says, against this recapture clause. They went to the Supreme Court, and recently the Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of the recapture clause.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] says that no money has been paid in. Of course, that was an unintentional error. I have a letter here from the Interstate Commerce Commission of May 9, showing that there has already been paid into the Federal Treasury $3,286,000 in actual cash. That has all been turned in. That is only a small part of what already appears on the record as excess earnings. I want to say that some of the railroads, in my judgment, are indulging in indefensible practices in their effort to avoid showing excess earnings. Some of them are making unwarranted claims as to valuation, and some of them are indulging in overmaintenance of their roads, to avoid showing excess earnings. But are we, without testing that, without trying that, without going and bringing from those roads the earnings which they should rightfully surrender—are we to go on and repeal this recapture clause without reservation and without consideration of whether the principle of surrender of excess earnings should be maintained? What would happen to these claims, aggregating many, many millions of dollars, which the Federal Government now has upon records already made from these prosperous roads? And yet, gentlemen, by one stroke of the pen, without consideration in committee, without any effort to find out the exact situation, seek to come here and repeal that section and release all these railroads from claims aggregating many, many millions of dollars which the Federal Treasury now has upon the railroads.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes more.

Mr. HOCH. The second part of the bill which we are asked to bring here without committee consideration is section 2, which automatically restores the freight rates which were in effect in this country at the close of Federal control.

Now, gentlemen, I come from a country where the burden of heavy freight rates has been grievous. I think members of the committee and others know that I have been somewhat active in seeking any possible measure of freight relief. I know that the proposal here is a seductive proposition, but I ask you as fair men to look that proposition squarely in the face. What do you propose to do? You propose by one act to wipe out all of the increased revenues of the railroads made necessary by the increase in operating costs, including the increases in labor costs. You leave all of the labor costs, and you leave all of the other operating costs of the railroads as they are, but you propose to simply wipe out the charges which the railroads make upon the public and from which alone they are able to meet these operating costs and these high labor costs.

I believe in good wages. I believe in maintaining a high standard of American living, and all of that, and I am not here discussing the question about labor costs, although I come from a country where the farmers have not fared as well, unfortunately, as the men employed upon the railroads.

Let me give you just a figure or two. During Federal control the operating expenses of the railroads in this country, comparing the last year of private control, 1917, with the last year of Federal control, 1919—the annual operating expenses of the railroads under Federal management were increased in one year $1,548,000,000. Of this amount, the increase in the pay roll alone amounted to $1,100,000,000. In addition to that increase in the labor costs of $1,100,000,000 during Federal control there was added in 1920 to the pay roll of the railroads an amount of $618,000,000. Now, I want to be entirely fair. Since that time this labor cost has been reduced about $450,000,000, which leaves a net increase since Federal control of $161,000,000 in labor costs alone. If you add that to the increase during Federal control——

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman means $1,610,000,000?

Mr. HOCH. No; I mean $161,000,000 as the net increase since Federal control, but if you add that to the increases during Federal control it amounts to $1,261,000,000.

Now, then, I ask the gentlemen who come here in the interest of American labor—and I stand with them in all fair measures for American labor—whether it is in the interest of American labor to take from the railroads by one sweep all increases in operating revenues, out of which alone they can pay these increases in labor costs. [Applause.] I ask whether it is in the interest of the American farmer, as much as he needs cheaper transportation, and I ask whether it is in the interest of American labor to wreck these railroads by one fell swoop and bring them to a condition of insolvency? My friends, I do not believe that any man can fairly take those figures and come out of that consideration and say that this is a fair measure.

Mr. WEFALD. The farmers are insolvent.

Mr. HOCH. Does the gentleman desire the railroads also to be insolvent?

Mr. WEFALD. I say, the farmers are insolvent.

Mr. HOCH. And I ask the gentleman again whether he desires to make the railroads insolvent?

Mr. WEFALD. Does the gentleman desire the farmers to be insolvent?

Mr. HOCH. I do not, and I am willing to compare records with the gentleman or anyone else here in manifested desire to give relief to the farmers in any possible practical way. I think that one of the ways to bring about a better condition for the American farmers is, while we are reducing freight rates as much as can be done, at the same time to see that we do not destroy the transportation system of the country, upon which its prosperity depends as much as any other factor. [Applause.] I desire to see every legitimate industry in this country solvent.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER]—I think not intentionally, however—misstated the effect of the bill which I introduced some time ago, upon which we have had hearings, and which, I am glad to say, is now upon the calendar of this House. It is not merely, as he says, for an investigation, but it directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to readjust these freight rates and correct whatever inequalities exist. If I had the time I think I could show that there are many inequalities. I think the basic commodities, particularly agricultural commodities, are bearing an unfair share of the freight burden in this country, and I want an adjustment to be made sanely and fairly and made in such a way as not only to bring relief to the people who need relief but at the same time made in such a way as will make it possible to maintain an adequate system of transportation in this country, which I do not believe any sane man in his sane moments wants to destroy. [Applause.]

I want to say in this connection that there was passed in the Senate day before yesterday a resolution as to freight rates similar to mine. I have no personal pride in my resolution as to form, but I hope we may get consideration for a measure of that sort which I think is sane and fair and which attempts to give a measure of relief in connection with the freight burden. But I am opposed—and I think in his better moments every Member in this House is opposed—to discharging a committee from the consideration of a bill like this and bringing it upon the floor of this House without hearings to develop the real facts, where every man knows a technical measure like this can not be fairly and properly drafted in the first instance. I am opposed to legislation in America by impulse. [Applause.]

Now, I might indulge in criticism. I have not always been satisfied with the speed made by the committee upon measures in which I was interested. I wonder if there are other gentlemen here who have at times, perhaps, been dissatisfied because committees of which they were members did not give as speedy consideration as they thought they ought to have to the particular measures in which they were interested. I have not always been satisfied. I have at times criticised, and perhaps sometimes too severely, the action of my own committee in some of these matters.

I am glad to say that we are to have hearings, beginning next week, on this subject, and if I had time I think I could show you that this committee is not subject to the extreme criticism that has been made upon the floor of this House.

We gave consideration, for instance—taking it from the railroad standpoint, from which the criticism has been made—recently to a very important measure introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] with reference to the boiler-inspection service. That measure is now on the calendar with a favorable report, and I trust we may get action upon it. We have the freight rates resolution here which I have referred to and which, in my judgment, is a substantial, constructive effort to bring relief along these lines.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will my friend from Kansas give me some idea when the truth in fabrics bill will be reported out of this committee?

Mr. HOCH. I will say to the gentleman that hearings have just been completed upon that measure. A subcommittee has been named to put together the various bills—and there were 10 or 12 of them, involving all sorts of very complicated considerations—and draft a composite bill. That problem itself is not as simple as it seems at first blush. I have been a friend of that measure, but I want to say to you that after the hearings I do not think it is a matter so simple that we can pass it out without giving it thorough consideration.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I agree with the gentleman, but it has been pending for five years before the committee, I understand.

Mr. HOCH. I am glad a subcommittee has been appointed, and I trust we may get action upon a measure of that sort. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

By special order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House: The Congress of the United States is an institution that was established by the Constitution of our country. It is chosen at the ballot box by the people of the several States in the exercise of the most solemn and serious function of citizenship. It embodies the very essence of representative government and institutions. It should never lack a defender. An adherence to that conviction has led me to-day to speak, when some one other than I should lift up his voice here; some Member of the majority of this Congress, the Speaker or the majority leader, Mr. LONGWORTH, who wear honors conferred by the majority of this body.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. What is the majority?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman from Iowa wants to know what is the majority. The majority is the most votes. The majority is the most votes that the Speaker got when he was elected Speaker and the gentleman from Ohio received when he was elected Republican floor leader. That is what a majority is.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. How often do we have it?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I have answered the gentleman and I hope he will ask me something that calls for some information.

But neither of these gentlemen speaks, neither cares nor dares to speak. They who should stand forth as the champions of the Congress sit silent in their seats. They who wear the honors of the Congress, and who should pick up the insulting challenge hurled into the face of the Congress, sit in their seats without resentment and permit abuse of the Congress to go unrebuked. That is my warrant for taking the liberty of calling the attention of this House to a recent publication in the Literary Digest of May 10, entitled "Leading Americans Attack and Defend Congress."

The Digest is a journal of 1,500,000 circulation and it reaches and makes a strong appeal to an influential reading public, and containing as it does some of the most savage thrusts at Congress it broadcasts them throughout the United States.

The article to which I refer opens with the following:

> Bolshevism and Congress were coupled as menaces to the American Nation at a conference of the American Bankers' Association in New York last week. "With such agencies at work in the country as Bolshevism and the present United States Congress, we have some job on our hands to maintain the integrity of the Nation and the security of her institutions," said the speaker, Mr. Orrin Lester, of the Bowery Savings Bank. "The worst thing we have is our American Congress," declared Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation, addressing the annual meeting of stockholders a few days earlier.

Further along in the article the editor comments as follows:

> The sharpest onslaughts against Congress seem to be made by spokesmen for business and finance—as illustrated by the words of Mr. Gary and Mr. Lester already quoted—among whom there seems to be a feeling that our legislators have hampered the advance of prosperity with partisan and unsettling investigations while neglecting to enact promised and essential measures.

And then Nicholas Murray Butler rises to remark:

> If the record of the present House of Representatives is bad, and if that of the Sixty-eighth Congress as a whole is one that gravely disappoints every patriotic American, what is to be said of the exhibition of shameless contempt for the public interest and of ill-mannered scandalmongering that is presented by the Senate?

The editor then observes:

> From presidents of chambers of commerce all over the country comes a sharp fire of criticism against our national legislators. Failure to enact the Mellon tax reduction bill is a heavy count against Congress, in the opinion of many of the chamber of commerce presidents.

Mr. Speaker, those charges are more than an attack upon the present and temporary membership of this Congress. If that were all that these charges imply, I, a member of the minority, would not feel compelled to repel assaults on the Republican majority, with which I frequently disagree. But these assaults go much farther. They constitute a subtle attack upon the Congress as an institution, an attack upon representative government as contrasted with rule by bureaucrats and cabinets; and I propose to demonstrate to this House that these men who bring these charges are opposed to the rule of a representative assembly, but want this Government controlled by cabinets and bureaucrats. That I propose to do, speaking alone for myself and the splendid constituency that has honored me with a seat in this Chamber.

What are the counts in this indictment drawn by these gentlemen? The first count is that Congress has not enacted the Mellon tax plan; second, that Congress has investigated and exposed some of the most startling and sensational scandals that ever stained the annals of American official life.

I have said these denunciations constituted an attack on representative government, and why? Steel King Gary, Mr. Lester, of the Bowery Savings Bank, and others in the columns of the Literary Digest are angry because Congress has not enacted the Mellon tax plan. Gentlemen, are they angry because Congress has not reduced taxation? Oh, no. Are they angry because Congress has not deliberated upon this question in its sessions and in its committees? Oh, no. Are they angry because through the Houses have not been passed any bills reducing taxes? Oh, no; because Congress has already passed a bill through each Chamber lowering taxes; a bill that gives greater relief to American taxpayers than the Mellon plan; a bill that reduces the taxes of every taxpayer in the United States; a bill that took into account the ability to pay and gave the greater reduction to persons having an annual income of $50,000 or less, while the Mellon plan proposed to give the greatest reduction to persons with annual incomes of $50,000 or more. And so these men are not angry because Congress has failed to reduce taxes. But the bill which passed Congress was not the Mellon plan, and these men assail Congress because it did not tamely accept the dictates of the Secretary of the Treasury, because the Congress failed and refused to enact the Mellon plan without changing a word or altering a figure. These men are mad with rage because the Congress of the United States, the elected representatives of the people, chose to exercise their constitutional function rather than to accept the dictates of a bureaucrat to pass a bill that was written in secret and thrown into this Chamber with the coarse demand that it be enacted just as it was written.

Of course, nobody is surprised that the United States Steel Corporation, that made fabulous profits during the war, that fattened off the woes and misfortunes not only of America but of the Allies, while the American people were pinching and sacrificing to buy bonds that were later sold at a discount; nobody is surprised that Judge Gary, the chairman of the board of that corporation, who directed its destinies during the war and who kept it down on the low sordid plane of greed while the spirit of America was lifted into the heights of exaltation; nobody is surprised that Judge Gary, now gorged with gains, with a debt of $20,000,000,000 and more hanging over the American people, is perfectly willing and desirous that Congress shall take a very large share of that burden off the owners of the Steel Corporation and thereby increase the great burden of debt which remains on the people of small and moderate incomes.

Nobody is surprised that Banker Lester, of the Bowery Savings Bank, whose profits come from the savings of the poor, is perfectly willing to have the taxes of himself reduced by a larger percentage than the tax of the poor upon whom he profits.

So I say this is a challenge to representative government because these gentlemen demand that this Congress accept the ukase of a Cabinet officer, that it shall not deliberate, but swallow speedily and quickly without examination of the contents, but noting only the label, the nauseous Mellon plan, prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and compounded in the secret precincts of his office.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I wonder if the gentleman noticed in the Literary Digest a column advertisement containing the announcement of the American Bankers' Association that could not possibly have any business reaction, and also that the Remington Typewriter Co. had a similar ad in the same number.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that I did not read the advertisements in the Digest, but I am sure his statement is correct as to that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As a matter of fact, the Literary Digest presented both sides of the question.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not desire to spend much time on the Literary Digest. I am pointing out the individuals and their interests as quoted in the Literary Digest. What are these gentlemen disturbed about? They are angered because Congress did not constitute itself so many wooden men with so many wooden heads and register the will of the Secretary of the Treasury. They are angry not because we have not reduced taxes but because at the press of a button in the Secretary of the Treasury's office this Congress did not transform itself into so many automatons and register the will of a bureaucrat not elected to office but holding his tenure of office by appointment. I say that sentiment, whether it comes from Judge Gary, of the Steel Corporation, or Mr. Lester, of the Bowery Savings Bank, or Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, or the man in the street, that kind of doctrine is a challenge to the very foundations upon which this institution of Congress rests. [Applause.]

What else do we find? They do not believe in popular government; they believe in Cabinet rule. They do not believe that Congress should regulate taxes, they do not believe that the fathers were wise when they placed in Congress the right to regulate taxes; they do believe that Mellon ought to regulate taxes and that Congress ought to merely go through some sort of a perfunctory confirmation of his decrees.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. We understand, do we not, that the Mellon plan was drawn up before Congress met; that the Secretary did not take into his confidence any Member of the incoming Congress, and that so far as we are advised he did not consult with the prospective majority leader or any gentleman who constituted the majority side of the House?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is my information gained from rumor. I have no knowledge on that subject because I am not in the confidence of the gentlemen mentioned. But I will say this, it is to the credit of a Representative of the majority on the other side of the Chamber, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, that he had the courage to repudiate the methods of the Secretary of the Treasury in trying to force down the throats of Congress such a bill without consideration and without proper deliberation. [Applause.] Be it said to the credit of the majority leader, the gentleman from Ohio, that after making several unsuccessful attempts to swallow the Mellon prescription he had the good sense to compromise with some gentlemen on his side and first made quite an improvement by perfuming it and coloring it to make it more palatable and acceptable, and finally abandoned it altogether. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that in the end there was hardly a handful of Members who voted against the amended bill in the House?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not know about the handful; there was a small minority.

Mr. BLANTON. About eight, I think.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Now, gentlemen, this indictment has two counts in it. What is the second count in the indictment? The second count is that they "have hampered the advance of prosperity with partisan and unsettling investigations."

True, gentlemen, the advance of the prosperity of Sinclair and Doheny, the oil magnates, a prosperity at the expense of the American naval oil reserves, has for the time being been slightly hampered. [Laughter.] Partisan investigations, say these gentlemen. Partisan! Why, gentlemen, is it partisan to insist on public officials being honest, is it partisan to detect criminal guilt and insist that the guilty be punished? Is that partisan? When did it become partisan to protect public property? But partisan and unsettling investigations! Now, it is true that these investigations have been somewhat unsettling. For instance, they unsettled Attorney General Daugherty [laughter] and jolted him out of the Cabinet.

They unsettled the mind of the President to let out Secretary Denby after he had said that it was settled that he would not let him out. They forced proceedings to unsettle some settlements made by Secretary Fall with Mr. Doheny and Mr. Sinclair. And so these caustic critics and especially Doctor Butler are unhappy and outraged because the Congress has unmasked criminal conspiracy between crooked big business and crooked big politics. Now, what would have been the situation if we had had no investigation? Secretary Fall would not have been forced to plead his own crime to avoid testifying. Mr. Fall would have his $100,000 received from Mr. Doheny and his $25,000 from Mr. Sinclair and would be posing as a distinguished former Cabinet member. Mr. Doheny would have the oil reserves in California; Mr. Sinclair would have possession of Teapot Dome; Mr. Denby would be now in the Department of the Navy, leasing out, I suppose, the rest of the oil reserves to the same parties, because he has said that he would do exactly what he did over again if he only got the chance. And Mr. Daugherty would be conducting the affairs of the Department of Justice. Is that all of the picture?

Mr. STENGLE. No; Burns.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Burns was merely a subordinate in the Department of Justice, but he would still be in office had Daugherty not been forced to resign.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Why not mention McAdoo?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will mention him. This is a nonpartisan matter, you can see from the interruptions. [Laughter.] Every time anybody mentions politics there are some gentlemen on the Republican side who begin to have nightmares about McAdoo, and they dream dreams about McAdoo. McAdoo whatever he may have done, I do not know whether he has done anything wrong or not, has not been shown by the evidence to have violated any law or to have done any wrong. If he committed any wrong, even as to ethics, he committed it while he was out of office as a private citizen. He did not betray the property of the people of the United States nor barter the public confidence of the people of the United States in a Cabinet office for dirty gold. [Applause.]

Now, let us see. I want to go a little further here. What else? This is not the only story. If Fall and Doheny and Sinclair and Denby and Daugherty had not been disturbed, Judge Gary and Mr. Lester and Doctor Butler would be happy. They would be partially happy at least, partially happy if these investigations had not taken place. Now, what do we find? We find that these men right here again betray their preference for the rule of cabinets and bureaucracy over the rights and the power of the Congress. They do not want these Cabinet officials interfered with. They do not believe the Congress ought to investigate their doings.

Do you believe, or do they believe, that the bureaucrats of the Cabinet, appointed and not elected, should act either within the law or without the law, as they may choose? Do these gentlemen mean to proclaim to the country that the people of the United States do not expect the Congress to protect their rights here in this Capital? Is it not the duty of Congress to investigate the dark places and find out the truth and drag out of their places those who betray the public trust and pull them out into the open places?

Mr. Speaker, the Congress ought to receive its instructions from the people, and the people alone; its investigations ought never to stop until every corrupt official is exposed; until every guilty man is punished. The American people believe in that doctrine. But Doctor Butler, Judge Gary, and the flock of critics in the Literary Digest do not accept that doctrine. They want the Congress to accept the dictates of Secretary Mellon, and want Congress to keep its hands off the investigation of the other bureaus. Fall was in the Cabinet, Daugherty was in the Cabinet, Denby was in the Cabinet, Mr. Mellon is still in the Cabinet. And these gentlemen rise and criticize Congress and want these Cabinet members to rule and want the Congress to stand aside. Doctor Butler, it should be said, complains of ill-mannered scandal-mongering in the Senate. It is possible Doctor Butler would not object to nice, refined, ladylike scandal-mongering, but he complains of "ill-mannered scandal-mongering." [Laughter.] It is only that particular kind and variety of scandal-mongering that seems to offend the delicate texture of his scholarly mind.

Mr. Speaker, the most amazing and remarkable thing about these shocking revelations is that any self-respecting element can look upon corruption in high office with complacency, if not toleration. Guilt is personal, it is true, but when it is condoned, when it is defended, it becomes more than personal. That any prominent man should condemn its exposure is alarming; it is a most distressing sign that his concept of public virtue is either subnormal or decayed. If this Republic shall ever perish, the forces of its destruction will be found in corruption and internal decay rather than in assault from without. The Goths and Vandals never, unresisted, trampled upon the prostrate Roman State until its once stern public virtue had become corrupted and its rulers and captains had fallen under the influence of gold and license.

And who are these men that assume the function of judging Congress? What sublimated beings are these? Whence do they derive this strange and occult wisdom that is superior to that of the makers of the Constitution? Why does the Digest place Judge Gary on the front page? Is it because he is a public benefactor? What distinguished service has he ever rendered to the public or to his generation? Is it upon that his fame depends, or does it rest upon the fact that he incarnates the sinister and sordid spirit of privilege and profiteering?

Now, what are these gentlemen's ideas about government? I have no doubt on earth that Judge Gary's idea of a proper substitute for Congress—because he says Congress is the worst thing we have; and if it is the worst thing we have, surely it ought to be destroyed—I have no doubt that Judge Gary's idea of a proper substitute for Congress would be a board of directors, with himself as chairman and all the other members of his own selection. I am satisfied that that kind of a governmental institution would function according to his idea of democracy.

Why, my friends, that is the same doctrine that every autocrat has embraced in one form or another from the old Egyptian King, Tutankhamen, of whom we have lately read, who made his subjects work 12 hours a day and bend their sweating backs to lift up a monument to their master, to Gary, who until recently worked his employees 12 hours a day to pile up profits for the masters of the Steel Corporation. Old King Tut got his monument because the law allowed him to take a certain toll out of the labor of his subjects, and Judge Gary gets his profits because the law allows him to lay a toll on the labor of every man who consumes steel products in the United States. Of course, Judge Gary would like to see his board of directors or some similar one running the Government of the United States.

Now, what does Doctor Butler say? What are his ideas about government? Doctor Butler made a speech several years ago and in it he said:

> I have no time now to more than indicate where I believe the path of true political progress for our democracy leads. It leads, in my judgment, not to more frequent elections, but to fewer elections. It leads not to more elective officers but to fewer. It leads not to more direct public interference with political institutions but to less. It leads to a political practice in which a few important officers are chosen to relatively long terms of service, given much power and responsibility, and are then held to strict accountability therefor.

That is the idea of Nicholas Murray Butler as to democratic institutions. He at that time said he wanted to hold officers to a strict accountability. He must have changed his mind. Now he does not seem to want to hold them to strict accountability, at least not to Congress and to strict investigation. Set over against the words of Butler the words of James Bryce in discussing the development of "Modern democracies":

> If we look back from the world of to-day to the world of the sixteenth century, comfort can be found in seeing how many sources of misery have been reduced under the rule of the people and the recognition of the equal rights of all.

And again:

> Yet the rule of many is safer than the rule of one—as Cavour said, that however faulty a legislative chamber may be, an ante-chamber is worse—and the rule of the multitude is greater than the rule of a class. However grave the indictment may be brought against democracy, its friends can answer, "What better alternative do you offer?"

While the world has been moving forward toward democracy Doctor Butler has been moving backward toward oligarchy. He wants fewer elective officers. And do you know that out of the 500,000 officials and employees of the Federal Government only 533—the Congress and President and Vice President—are elected, while all the remaining half million men are bureaucrats and Cabinet heads and subordinates?

Mr. Butler no doubt believes in a rule by the President and by the Cabinet. You will recall that a few years ago he was a candidate for the nomination for President on the Republican ticket, an enterprise, if Democrats were moved by partisan considerations, in which we would look with great pleasure upon his success. He may still entertain that ambition. He may still run for the Republican nomination some day; and I want to observe that since the coming of woman suffrage the strength of Doctor Butler has greatly increased, because I understand that he now has the support of both himself and his wife in his candidacy for the nomination for the Presidency. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for five minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, if Congress is not to rule this country, if the laws of America are not to be enacted in these two Chambers that sit under this Dome, who is to rule? There is no one else to rule the Federal Government except the bureaus and the Cabinet in this city and elsewhere throughout the Republic—bureaus and cabinets who owe no direct responsibility to the people—bureaus and cabinets to whom Gary, Lester, and Butler hope to have easy and frequent access. Tyranny is the abuse of power whether by a king or a bureau—and the most despicable of tyrants is an arrogant bureau head. If Congress does not curb the demands of the bureaus, taxes will be vastly increased instead of decreased. It is the habit of bureaus to grasp more power, to increase the number of employees, and to intrude their authority farther and farther into the affairs of the citizen.

Gary and Lester and Butler may have received some inspiration for their utterances from high official sources. The President, like Gary and the rest, demanded that Congress accept the Mellon plan just as it was sent to the Capitol, and when Congress dared to legislate in fact and dared to investigate, he sneeringly referred to Congress in these words:

> and the Congress or the legislative branch, which is supposed under the Constitution to be engaged in legislation.

And then after losing from his Cabinet Denby and Daugherty by the investigation route, he protested, in a message to the Senate, against an investigation of Secretary Mellon, after the Secretary had protested to him.

Mr. Speaker, whatever the source of these attacks, the functions of Congress must be maintained—the right of the Congress to investigate, a Democratic administration, or a Republican administration, must be vindicated. The Congress must not surrender its power to reduce taxes in the interest of all the people and cowardly submit to the demand of selfish interests.

Congress must first do its duty by doing right and then trust the public, when informed, when it learns the truth, to approve its course. If this Congress had adopted the Mellon plan and had not exposed public corruption, Gary and Butler would have thought it one of the best in our history. Gentlemen, so it is that we are confronted by this challenge by men of prominence like Gary and Butler; a defiant challenge wherein they say that the worst thing we have is the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Did he think it so bad that it ought to be adjourned for five years before they raised the protective tariff in 1921?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, no. The gentleman got what he wanted out of Congress in 1921, and that is the tariff bounty; and now he is perfectly willing for the Congress to adjourn until he hopes it will raise it another peg.

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. Why does not the gentleman comment on what Samuel Gompers and numerous other heads of labor organizations say in the Literary Digest? Some of their strictures are worse than those he has mentioned.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not want to be diverted. Some well-informed men brag on Congress. [Laughter]

Let me say that when Judge Gary says that the American Congress is the worst thing we have on our hands he is but repeating the cry that comes down to us through six centuries of struggle toward liberty. Why, there will be Garys and Lesters and Butlers to scoff at a Congress they can not control as long as the contest between the people and the great covetous and selfish interests goes on.

Mr. MacLAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No. I have only two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Gentlemen, in the olden time, in the year 1265, I believe it was, when the English Parliament was established, there were those who opposed its establishment. All the beneficiaries of royal favor were against it, all the court favorites were opposed to it, all of the cabinet denounced it, all who had the King's ear fought it. The cry of Judge Gary is but an echo of that same cry that they hurled at the doors of the Parliament of England. Judge Gary says the worst thing we have is our American Congress. I would remind Judge Gary that the worst thing that the beneficiaries of privilege had on their hands 600 years ago was the Parliament at Westminster. I would remind him that the worst thing that Charles I had on his hands was the Parliament of the English people. I would remind him that the worst thing that Louis XVI had on his hands was the States-General, the National Assembly, and the convention of the French people. And I would remind Judge Gary that the worst thing that George III had on his hands was the Continental Congress [applause], that led the people of the American Colonies to tear down the power and the majesty of a King and his court and build up the power of the American people [applause]; the Garys and Lesters and Butlers shall not tear it down. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] is recognized.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 10 additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, with a considerable portion of the address just delivered I am in accord. However, I believe that the best feeling Members of Congress can have is to so conduct themselves as to feel absolutely innocent when charges like the Literary Digest charges are flaunted in their faces. I do not think it makes much difference about the criticisms of Congress unless the criticisms are based on facts.

It is rather unfortunate that all the criticism that Congress is receiving now does not come from Butler and Gary. The people of this country were in thorough sympathy with Congress so long as they believed the investigations that were being made were made in the interest of the Government, and so long as they believed that we were seeking to clean house and punish the guilty I think the sentiment of the whole country was with Congress. But I do think that when it became apparent that certain men were called across the continent—like Al Jennings and this man, Means—and given headlines in the newspapers for a good many days, that the folks got to thinking whether it was true or not, and that was not confined to Gary and Butler. People got to thinking that there was a little politics in it and they became disgusted with the conduct of certain investigations. Whether the Congress could have protected itself by being fair with itself on that criticism is too patent for answer.

Now, I am seriously in favor of not having things about for which we can be criticized, and then if they criticize just let them go. But let us see what we are doing over here. There are some things which have been bothering me a little lately. I do not like to repeat. I have talked twice on this so-called Barkley bill, and I have been criticized for those speeches. I have examined them and examined them more, and I am not here to retract anything, but I am here for the purpose of emphasizing, if possible, some of the things I have already said.

I have in mind this morning a residence block out in a country county-seat town. On the corner of this block lives the pharmacist, a highly educated man about 45 years old, a man who has worked in the same store for 10 or 15 years. He gets $120 a month. He works six days a week, 10 or 12 hours, and then he goes to the store and fills prescriptions for the sick on Sunday. He is a respectable man, and he has gotten along some way on $120 a month. Next door to this pharmacist is the bank cashier. I have noticed recently that his hair is turning prematurely gray, because the struggle since the war has been an uphill one. He gets $125 a month, because this is in an agricultural section. He has not much prospect for a raise, and if he has any stock in the bank he has not gotten any dividends and will not receive any for some little time. Then, next in that block is the fireman who runs the train over to the main line. He will never be an engineer, they say, because there is some qualification he does not possess. Although he is a middle-aged man he will never be promoted to an engineer, but he gets $11.45 a day, and his working time is only about six hours, although he is on duty eight hours. Sometimes he is on duty a little longer and sometimes he gets in some extra time, but he is well paid for it, and $11.45 is his salary. Then, next is a widow. Her husband died about the time the war came on. They had two boys practically grown, and a little girl. They lived on a farm but they bought this little house in town so that she might send the children to high school, and she stayed there in the wintertime. One of the boys has married and the other brother lives with him out on the farm and they are working it, but she is still there in that house in order to send the little girl to high school, and I think she graduates this year. They have had to mortgage the farm since the war, in the farm-loan bank. Not because of mismanagement, but because of depressed prices, they have not been able to make a living on that 640 acres of land.

Then next is the grocery man, who had an invoice of $6,000 before the war. He worked hard 12 and 14 hours a day for six days in the week. He is a thrifty fellow, but things have not been well with him. I know he was out of debt just before the war, and I know he is in debt a little now. And so on around the block. The next man is the county treasurer, a reputable farmer who came in there and took the office of county treasurer because the neighbors love and respect him and know he is an honest man. His salary is $1,500 a year. There is no one in the block who gets half what the fireman gets, and yet here we are proposing a law which will take up all the remainder of the time of the American Congress, and it is proposed in obedience to the demands of the lobby over here which says that this Congress must spend the balance of its time in legislating for organized labor. Oh, yes; the statement was made openly—with the gallery full of his friends—by the gentleman from Alabama. He stood here and tragically declared that on this side is peace and on this side is war. The druggist, the banker, the pharmacist, and the widow have no lobby here. They can not maintain a newspaper in the city of Washington to publish the names of the Congressmen who do not obey their beck and call, and so clip this out and put it away for future reference.

Ah, my friends, I would rather have the feeling that the charge that I acted at the beck and call of that outfit was not true than to have all the magazines lay off in criticism. [Applause.] Their criticisms do not need to worry us if we do the right thing.

This morning we spent our time in debating whether we would discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and take up another one of those bills. I do not know why, unless it is because we reported out a bill which we think will reduce freight rates on agricultural products. I think it is about time the folks at home had the right to believe that the pharmacist and ordinary fellow will have the same treatment in the American Congress as though they had lobbies down here standing at our doors every morning.

There is not a man in my district, farmer or business man, who is worth as much money to-day as he was when the Adamson law was passed. The Adamson law did make a joke of the American Congress. They took us by the throat—I was not here at the time, and I suppose if I had been I would have been in it, too—and said, "You must pass this law; we will have no other." And from that day to this they have felt that at any time just before a presidential election they can walk in and take the Congress by the throat and say, "You must pass this measure."

Ah, my friends, they ask you as the representatives of all the people to take the bill that their lawyers, high-priced men, spent weeks and months on, perfecting it from their standpoint, and vote blindly on it as a representative of all the people.

This block of residents is in every one of your towns, and I hope that every Member of Congress between now and next Monday——

Mr. WEFALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I do not yield to the gentleman.

I hope every Member of Congress will get in mind a picture of those people and will remember that they are entitled to our consideration here the same as though they had a newspaper to denounce you and a lobby to sit in the gallery and hiss or applaud you. [Applause.]

I think this is a happy morning, and let us start out now to stop such articles of criticism as appear in the newspapers, and the best way to stop them is to say that from now on every one of us is going to do what he believes to be right, regardless of what the lobby here tells us to do. [Applause.] If you do that, the Barkley bill will not last 30 minutes, because it is undoubtedly the most vicious legislation that anyone ever tried to thrust down the throat of an American Congress. It ignores the rights of everyone and attempts to legislate for a class—a class that you know has the best of it right now.

I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 8886, a bill providing for sundry matters affecting the Military Establishment. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand there is an amendment to be offered. There will be opportunity to offer amendments, I presume.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the membership of the House that this bill represents a conclusion reached by the representatives of the National Guard in conjunction with the officers of the Regular Army and the Secretary of War concerning little defects that exist in the present national defense act. The bill tends to equalize and put the National Guard on the same footing as the officers and men in the Regular Army, and I do not think there will be one objection to this bill. However, it will be read section by section, and if the Members feel they ought to offer any amendment, that opportunity will be given. My reason for doing this, I want to say, is because we have a great many bills from our committee and many of the Members have matters of great importance to them on the calendar, and I simply desire to expedite the work. I have no interest in any one of these bills above another, and I simply wish to expedite the work in order that the Members may get action on their bills which are pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 87 of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

"And provided further, That property issued to the National Guard and which has become unserviceable through fair wear and tear in service, may, after inspection thereof and finding to that effect made by an officer of the Regular Army designated by the Secretary of War, be sold or otherwise disposed of, and the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, accountable, shall be relieved from further accountability therefor; such inspection, and sale or other disposition, to be made under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, and to constitute as to such property a discretional substitute for the examination, report, and disposition provided for elsewhere in this section."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I feel that in fairness to the membership of the House I ought to make a brief statement in connection with this bill in order that they may know the facts. I do not wish to mislead any Member of the House in connection with the proposed legislation.

Section 1 simply amends the national defense act, covering the disposition and the replacement of damaged property in the hands of the National Guard. Section 1 of this bill simply adds the proviso to both the Government and the National Guard and makes it satisfactory to both branches.

Section 2 of the national defense act is the section providing for the training of the National Guard. The amendment provides that several detachments may combine for drill, and so forth, and cures the defect in the law now held by the comptroller that in order to be entitled to Army drill pay, drills must be attended by all units of an organization. This simplifies the thing so that the National Guard can go on and do their training to great advantage over the present system.

Section 3 provides that the rates of pay shall be under the present laws governing pay, as approved by the act, and amends section 109 of the national defense act. It increases the number of possible drills from five to eight in any one calendar month. The purpose of this is that during the summer months there might be companies that could drill to greater advantage in wintertime than in the summer months, when they are busy; and this section takes care of that.

As a matter of fact, there is not anything in this bill that is revolutionary or does anything except put the National Guard practically on the same basis as the Regular Army.

The expense involved comes in section 6. It is estimated that this amendment will involve an additional expense of $60,000, but no additional appropriation will be requested for the year 1925.

That is about all there is to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKENZIE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 2169, to amend in certain particulars the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that this bill includes a number of matters, some of which died on the calendar in the last Congress. It also has a provision affecting the detailing of all officers with troops, and it is limited to the Medical Department. The House might want to change that amendment of the committee, but I want to say that if this bill is permitted to be considered on the Union Calendar after the first section is read, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT], who reported the bill, will take the floor and explain the bill in detail.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, how much is this going to cost the Federal Treasury?

Mr. McKENZIE. So far as the section covering the increase in the percentage of noncommissioned officers, which is the same as it was a year ago, for we amended it in committee, it will be about one million and a half dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. How much will the whole bill cost the Government?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not think there is very much in the other sections that will cost anything.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Illinois is a careful legislator, and he knows what a piece of legislation is going to cost before it gets behind him. How much is the bill going to cost the Federal Treasury?

Mr. McKENZIE. I have not the figures here.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. If my friend will wait until I can explain the bill, I will give him the figures.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the idea—if this bill is going to cost a whole lot, it ought to be debated in the Committee of the Whole House, but if it is not, the membership will probably be willing to have it debated in the House.

Mr. McKENZIE. The first section which will cost money as I say will cost a million dollars and a half.

Mr. BLANTON. How much will the whole bill cost?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I have the figures here. I have not footed up the total, but I can give each item, and the gentleman can make his own computation. The first section provides for the increase in the number of noncommissioned officers and will not cost more than $1,575,000 estimated.

Mr. BLANTON. How much more each year thereafter?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is the maximum that it can cost. It is represented that it will require no additional appropriation this year because there are funds available to take care of it. The personnel of the Regular Army is not up to maximum yet. In the second section there is no cost whatever; the third section no cost whatever. In the fourth section no cost, and the fifth section provides for the forage of animals owned and hired by the State. That may cost $50,000 if taken full advantage of.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the forage provided for them the year round?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I presume it would be for the year round because the horses being owned by the State are necessarily to be fed the entire year. These are animals for the National Guard owned by the State. There is a slight addition in the number of caretakers allowed to the heavier than air squadron, an increase of $25,000. Then there is one lieutenant colonel which will be provided for one of the ancient organizations of the State of Massachusetts, which is entitled to have him under the existing law. That will be $900.

Mr. BLANTON. The whole cost is within $2,000,000.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Well, within $2,000,000—I think $1,700,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the respective grade percentages prescribed in section 4 (b) of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, of the total authorized number of enlisted men shall not exceed seventy-nine one-hundredths of 1 per cent for the first grade, 2.17 per cent for the second grade, 2.99 per cent for the third grade, 10.11 per cent for the fourth grade, 9.5 per cent for the fifth grade, and 25 per cent for the sixth grade; and aforementioned section 4 (b) is hereby amended accordingly.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out seventy-nine one-hundredths of 1 per cent and insert "0.79 per cent."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I have another committee amendment, which I will offer now or at the proper time. Shall I offer it now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can offer it when the gentleman from New York yields the floor.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. There will be at least two committee amendments offered in the progress of the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. That is, we will take the amendments up in their order?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I am assuming that the committee amendments will be offered at their place in the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Very well.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I will be as brief as I can in the explanation of the provisions of this bill. Section 1 proposes to amend section 4 (b) of the national defense act in so far as it divides into seven grades the enlisted personnel of the Army. In 1920 Congress adopted a new method for the grading of enlisted commissioned personnel, and they were divided into seven grades. The law specified the percentage for each grade, and that percentage determined the number and the sum total of those percentages making up the authorized enlisted strength of the Army.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Percentages of what?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Percentages of the total authorized enlisted strength of the Regular Army. Now, those percentages were based upon the experience then available and based also upon the enlisted strength of an Army of 280,000. In addition to the normal tasks of the noncommissioned officers of the Army——

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I will.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman explain just what these percentages do? Does it increase the number of officers in the Army or decrease them, or just what does it do?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I will come to that if the gentleman will permit me to make an explanation as briefly as I can in my own way, and I think I shall answer the question before I get through. Now, in addition to the normal tasks of the higher grades of the enlisted personnel, namely, the noncommissioned officers of the line of the Army, as you are all aware a large number are required for duties with the National Guard, with the schools, and with the Organized Reserves. Now, the reductions in the Army from 280,000 to 225,000, of course, has much reduced the number of noncommissioned personnel. The percentages by law, of course, remain fixed, and the tasks, irrespective of those in the line of the Army, have not only not decreased, but have increased. The reduction of the Army from an enlisted strength of 280,000 to 125,000 has resulted in a reduction of the noncommissioned officers of the Army of over 8,000.

This section proposes by changing the percentages, particularly the percentages in the four higher grades, to increase the noncommissioned personnel by 1,987. That increase will be in the first grade, master sergeants, 237; second grade, technical and first sergeants, 515; and the third grade, staff sergeants, 1,750, with a reduction in the fourth grade of duty sergeants of 375, making the net increase of noncommissioned officers of 1,987. The purpose of this increase is to enable the War Department to carry on successfully and efficiently the important duties involved in the training and instruction of the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, the civilian military training camps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and other activities. It has been found that the number at present——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to continue for an additional 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I will.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. In this increased number of officers what cost does it involve?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I attempted to answer that question when propounded by the gentleman from Texas, $1,575,000. Now, the second section, unless there are some further questions in regard to the first, originally provided for a complete change in the law with regard to the duty of commissioned officers of the Army with troops, but there was so much objection to that that finally the committee determined that the only change that should be made in that regard should be in the Medical Corps in order to give the President authority to retain a medical officer at a hospital or other similar establishment for a period of more than four years if deemed desirable. Under the present law an officer is only permitted to remain away from duty with troops for four years, after which he must return to actual duty with troops. But the committee decided that a different situation was presented with regard to the Medical Corps; that it would be advisable to permit the President to retain at some of the medical establishments—let us say, for example, Walter Reed Hospital here in Washington—some of the distinguished surgeons who have been developed in the medical service of the Army.

Mr. BLANTON. Before the gentleman reaches it, and while the gentleman is generally discussing the bill, would he kindly explain section 9 to us?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I will propose an amendment to section 9, striking that from this bill because that is included, as I recall, in the bill just passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Section 109 will be stricken out.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I understand that section 9 has been incorporated in the bill just passed. If that is the case it will be stricken out of this bill, of course. Now, the authority——

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Do I understand the gentleman correctly to say that section 9 will be stricken out?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. If it is included in the bill just passed as explained by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

Now as to section 3 of the bill——

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Does the gentleman mean section 9 or section 109?

Mr. BLANTON. Section 9, the last section of the bill.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he referred to "section 109."

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman explain No. 9?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes; I will explain it when I get to it, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. BLANTON. There was some question as to whether that section was in a bill that had been disapproved by the President. We want to know something about it before we reach it. Would the gentleman mind letting us know about the provisions in that section now?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. If the gentleman will permit, I will be glad to explain it when we come to that section.

Section 2 provides that officers of the National Guard shall be commissioned in the Army of the United States. This is to remove an objection which the National Guard officers have to taking Reserve commissions. Up to this time not over 50 per cent of the National Guard officers have taken Reserve commissions. Thus there are not 50 per cent of them who would be available for Federal service in time of emergency. Now to obviate objections on that score, and in deference to the wishes of the National Guard, expressed in their national convention, also on the recommendation of a commission composed of officers of the Regular Army and of the Reserve and of the National Guard which met recently here in Washington under appointment from the Secretary of War, this provision is being proposed, which will result in all officers of the Reserve being commissioned, as they should be, in the Army of the United States, recognizing the fact that the basic, all-inclusive establishment is the Army of the United States in which the Regular Army, the Reserves, and the National Guard are merely components. So in Federal service the National Guard officer will receive, if he desires it—it will not be obligatory—in addition to his National Guard commission, which of course comes from the State, a commission from the President of the United States in the Army of the United States Reserves.

It is also provided in this section that the National Guard officer may hold this commission as long as he holds his National Guard commission, relieving him of the present provision of the law which limits the Reserve commission to five years, thus preventing the necessity of the National Guard officer being reexamined and recommissioned every five years.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I could not hear distinctly on account of the confusion in the Chamber whether the gentleman answered my question a little while ago or not. I want to ask it now in a little different way. This is to increase the number of commissioned officers to 1,987. Has that necessity arisen from the fact that so many officers have been promoted, and so many retired so that they could be promoted, and you have no vacancies now? Have so many commissioned officers been promoted that you have a lack now of the noncommissioned officers?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I thought I had made that clear. The reduction of the Army from 280,000 to 125,000 had resulted in the reduction of the noncommissioned officers by 8,000.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Ohio will understand this, that those 1,987 are additional noncommissioned officers added to the present establishment.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. No. Let me correct the gentleman. This will in no way increase the authorized maximum of the Army.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not talking about that. I am talking about the present personnel as it exists now.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. It would not increase by one man the personnel.

Mr. BEGG. Is not the situation this: That you have none now, and you must create some?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. No; that is not the fact.

Mr. BEGG. I can not read anything else, either in the report or in this bill, than that men have been promoted from noncommissioned to commissioned officers, and then so many have been promoted out that you have a shortage of "noncoms" now.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. No. I have never heard that feature of it referred to in any way in the discussion of this measure.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE In response to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], he has evidently forgotten that Congress legislated out of the Army several hundred commissioned officers a few years ago at the same time that we were cutting down the enlisted personnel.

Mr. BEGG. It was a hardship on them when we let them out.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he will remember that right after the war, when there was a reorganization, there were so many promotions that we did not have a second lieutenant.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. That is what has happened now.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to have somebody who is frank tell all about it.

Mr. SPEAKS. This will not increase the enlisted personnel of the Army by one man. This will not increase the commissioned personnel of the Army in any particular. What is required and desired in this bill is to furnish some additional noncommissioned officers who can be sent out to the National Guard organizations.

Mr. BEGG. What became of the noncommissioned officers who were in the Army two years ago?

Mr. SPEAKS. I might say this: That two years ago, before the strength of the Army was increased to such a wide extent, there was an ample number of noncommissioned officers. But to-day we are sending out noncommissioned officers to the National Guard organizations in every State of the Union, and they are constantly clamoring for more, one in the gentleman's town, probably.

Mr. BEGG. Yes; and they will have one there if you pass this bill. It is a good place to spend the summer.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. In order that the gentleman may get this clear in his mind I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] if this is not true, that when the Army was reorganized on the basis of 280,000, there were 0.6 of 1 per cent of the enlisted men put in the top grade. This bill provides for 0.79 of 1 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKS. Absolutely.

Mr. McKENZIE. When the Army was reduced, following the law, they had to reduce down the number of noncommissioned officers in that grade and in all the other grades, and they simply pushed them down from the top to the grades of first-class privates and privates. That is what happened.

Mr. SPEAKS. Now, one thing more. I want to confess that, in my judgment, we have too many major generals and brigadier generals and colonels and lieutenant colonels, but we have not too many of these noncommissioned officers and enlisted men. I say frankly that so far as the higher grades are concerned I would be willing to reduce the number at any time, and I have so stated on this floor. But in the case of these noncommissioned officers, we do not have enough. They are men of long experience and men who are required to perform important duties, and in many cases now a first-class private is required to perform duties which ought to be looked after by a sergeant or corporal.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it not true that the number of noncommissioned officers is a percentage of the enlisted personnel of the Army?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Absolutely.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it not true also that there is considerable use for noncommissioned officers on service away from the enlisted personnel?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. More use than ever.

Mr. TEMPLE. When we reduced the number of enlisted personnel we did not reduce the number of places outside the Regular Army service.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is it exactly.

Mr. TEMPLE. Now, we need more men, but not for service with the enlisted personnel.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. TEMPLE. When we reduced the number we did not reduce the number of these outside places; consequently six-tenths of 1 per cent of 280,000 will furnish more of the men available for outside work than six-tenths of 1 per cent of 70,000.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is correct. The gentleman has made a more lucid statement than I could make. Section 4 simply provides that on reenlistment a man may be enlisted for one or three years. To-day reenlistments are limited to one year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. May I have another five minutes?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that the gentleman have 10 minutes additional? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman about section 9 of the bill.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I have not come to that yet.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I thought the gentleman was discussing the bill generally.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. No; I am attempting to explain each section. Now, section 5 provides that animals owned by the State and used exclusively for military purposes may be foraged out of Federal funds. It also provides for five additional caretakers for each of the heavier-than-air squadrons of the Aviation Service of the National Guard. This will mean one caretaker for each plane, whereas in the Regular Service there are two caretakers for each plane. As I have said, section 6 is to be stricken out of this bill because it is included in the bill just passed. The purpose of section 7 is simply to authorize, in time of peace, a lieutenant colonel, as well as a major, for a Massachusetts organization which has had this additional officer since the time of its organization in 1792. Section 8 provides that enlisted men should be paid for drills actually made and not limited merely to 60 per cent of the drills made during a month. Of course, the present provision of law was intended to induce greater regularity at drills, but the effect has been found to be just the reverse.

It should need no explanation or no justification that we should pay these men for drills actually made. Section 9 of the bill, as to which I have been interrogated, simply provides that when noncommissioned officers of the Army who served as commissioned officers during the World War are retired they may be retired as warrant officers, the highest grade of noncommissioned officers. The comptroller, or maybe it is the Judge Advocate of the Army, has ruled that only those who were discharged during the World War should be discharged as warrant officers. It should need no explanation that those men who served as commissioned officers during the World War who return to the service and who have been serving as noncommissioned officers should be retired with the highest possible grade of noncommissioned officers.

Are there any further questions with regard to this bill which any Member desires to ask?

Mr. CONNERY. Section 9 would merely cover the fact that a man who served during the World War as a noncommissioned officer and who stayed in the Army would receive his discharge on retirement as a warrant officer?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is it exactly.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests, if there is no objection, that the Clerk read the substitute instead of reading the sections stricken out.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Add at the end of section 4c of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, the following sentence: "When in his judgment efficiency demands such action, the President is authorized to except officers of the Medical Corps from the provisions of this section requiring duty with troops of one or more of the combatant arms."

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have a committee amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a committee amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. WAINWRIGHT: Page 4, line 6, add the following: "The appointment as Chief of Infantry, of Cavalry, of Field Artillery, or of Coast Artillery, of an officer of a grade above that of colonel shall create a vacancy in such grade, but shall not deprive the officer so appointed of the commission he otherwise holds in the Army: Provided, That the authorized total number of officers in the Army shall not be exceeded and that no officer serving as chief of any branch shall while so serving be appointed as a brigadier general. The President may at any time discharge the chief or any assistant chief of any branch from his office as such, and such officer when so discharged shall resume the position he would have occupied but for his appointment as such chief or assistant chief."

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, taking the last provision first, this gives the President the right to discharge a chief or assistant chief of any branch. Under the present law the President has not that right, nor has anybody that authority, except, as I understand, Congress. It has seemed to our committee that the Executive should have that right.

The provision in the first sentence provides that if an officer is appointed above the grade of colonel in the four combat branches—the Infantry, the Cavalry, the Field Artillery, and Coast Artillery—a vacancy shall be created. Under the present law the appointment of an officer above the grade of colonel does not create a vacancy, and the consequence is that if a brigadier general is appointed as the chief of one of these arms we may get a major general, but we lose a brigadier general. This is proposed in order to enable the President and the Secretary of War to make the selections for chiefs of the combat branches from among those who should be best qualified, namely, brigadier generals, who have been selected on account of their superior ability and without sacrificing a brigadier general or reducing the number of brigadiers by making such appointment. Under the present law the practice is to appoint colonels so as not to lose a brigadier general. This will create no more brigadier generals and it will operate to avoid losing a brigadier general upon the promotion of a brigadier general to major general as chief of one of the combat branches mentioned.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the gentleman going to do about the recommendation made by our colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS]? He said we had too many of them.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I know the views of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] with regard to those questions. I have heard them very often expressed in the committee, but I am sure General SPEAKS will agree with me that this will not increase the number of brigadiers.

Mr. BLANTON. But we all have confidence in the judgment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS], and he says we have too many brigadier generals, too many major generals, and too many colonels.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Oh, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] is for this proposition. There is no question about that.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not heard him speak for it, but I heard him, just a moment ago, speak against the policy and the principle of it.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Not against this proposition. May I say to the committee that this is the only proposition—I do not know whether this is going to help or hurt the proposition—that General Pershing has asked; and the only thing that General Pershing himself came before the committee and advocated strongly, stating that he considered it was vital that he should have this power in order that he might be able to appoint the best man he could find for chief of the four combat branches.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order that the gentleman from Kansas may ask a question; and I also want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ANTHONY. I simply want to ask a question of the gentleman from New York to find out exactly what this provision does. It seems to me, in the first place, it creates additional colonels in the Army, because that is the class of officer from which these chiefs of branches will be appointed. You say that the appointment of a colonel to chief of a branch as major general shall create a vacancy. That means some other man can be promoted up to the grade that is vacated; is that right?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. A brigadier is appointed a major general and chief of branch.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not always; he can be appointed from a colonelcy.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. But assuming a brigadier general is appointed, this bill is to enable the appointment of a brigadier without the loss of the authorized number of brigadiers. For instance, a brigadier is appointed major general; that will create a vacancy in the list of brigadiers.

Mr. ANTHONY. And make the appointment of another brigadier possible.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Of course, a colonel will be appointed a brigadier and there will be promotion up the line. Of course, that will necessarily follow.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then in regard to the other language in the paragraph giving the President the authority to remove these chiefs of branches at any time, heretofore they have had a four-year tenure of office?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not this mean in substance that when the chief of a branch office differs in policy with anyone of higher authority his head would come off? Do you not think that would interfere with the exercise of free judgment on the part of the chief of a branch?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I do not think so. I think we should be willing to trust the President of the United States and the Secretary of War to justly exercise that authority. Let us take the other case. There may be some chief of a branch who may be very unsatisfactory for many reasons. As the law stands to-day, it is impossible for the President to get rid of such a chief of branch, as I understand it, without a resolution of Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman know that when the legislation was passed creating these chiefs of branches it was done with the idea of getting men of long experience, experts, technical men at the head of these branches, so we could have the benefit of their judgment in the administration of the branches? If we provide they shall not have a four-year tenure of office and their heads can be chopped off at any time, these men will simply be the clerks of the higher authority and will not be able to exercise their own mature judgment in the administration of their branches.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I do not see why it should in any way interfere with the independence or the efficiency of the chief of a branch, but I do see how it would give the President this power—which I believe he should have—with regard to any officer so appointed.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the gentleman knows the President never exercises this power. This power is always exercised by the Chief of Staff or some officer who operates the War Department in his name.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment? I did not listen to the reading of your amendment, but does it include the provision that any officer serving as a chief of branch can not be promoted to the grade of brigadier general while so serving?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes; it does. I should have stated that. In the interest of saving time I overlooked that feature of the provision.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to say to the members of the committee that this is the situation: When General Pershing came to see about this matter, I said to him very frankly that in my judgment it was a 50–50 proposition so far as the Army was concerned, and the criticism made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is one of the criticisms that can be made. On the other hand, if the hands of the War Department are tied by getting an inefficient man detailed as chief of a branch, of course that is not good for the service. I can understand that, but here is what we want to protect. We want to legislate in the interest of the Military Establishment and not in the interest of individual officers, and for that reason the committee inserted a provision to prevent promotion while an officer is serving as chief of a branch. For example, a colonel under the law can be appointed chief of any of the branches, and while so serving he draws the pay of a major general. Now, while serving as major general in that capacity, he is in fact a colonel. If there is a vacancy in the grade of brigadier general, he could be transferred into the grade of brigadier general and made a brigadier general while serving as a major general, chief of a branch, and we feel this way about it, or at least I do, that the colonels in the Army at least ought to have a fair show, and it would not be fair to permit, under the law, the making of a colonel a major general, and while so serving as chief of a branch promote him into the vacancy created in the grade of brigadier general.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. What happens to the vacancy of the colonel?

Mr. McKENZIE. They fill it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I agree with the acting chairman of the committee that in legislation of this kind we want to legislate for the benefit of the Military Establishment and not for the individual. What is the result? The more power you concentrate in the Chief of Staff and the General of the Army, or nominally in the President, the more you promote the absolute control of the heads of these branches. I have had some experience very recently. When we had the military bill under consideration I called the attention of the House to the maneuvers at Panama where the aviation cooperated with the Coast Defense Corps and the Navy.

A report was submitted by the Army and the Navy. Where the report is we could not ascertain. When you asked one branch of the War Department they referred you to some other bureau. It is impossible to obtain any information of the result of those maneuvers to guide us in our work in legislating for the Army. Why is that? We got information unofficially. Some very interesting facts were learned as a result of the maneuvers. I gather information from various sources and yet we are unable to be officially informed. I often hear experts in the Army tell of startling facts, but they will add "I can not tell it officially." When you ask for information you are unable to get it, and if a report is submitted not in accordance with the ideas of the General Staff you can not get the facts. That is the condition that exists to-day. You can try as much as you like to legislate for the Army and improve the establishment, but you are up against the stubbornness of the General Staff. If there were more of a spirit of cooperation with us it would be better for the Army and better for the country. You undertake to provide for the heads of the branches. If a colonel is promoted to the head of one branch he takes the rank and pay of a major general. You want to fill that gap. Suppose he finishes his time as head of the branch, what becomes of him?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is just what we want to get rid of, appointing a colonel; this is to enable the department to appoint a brigadier.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. But you fill the vacancy of the colonel. Suppose a new man is relieved after six months as the head of the branch of the Army, what happens?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. He goes back as a brigadier and another brigadier is appointed in his place.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. If the gentleman believes that it will improve the establishment, make it more modern and businesslike, and produce better cooperation, I am for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. General Pershing believes that it will add to the efficiency of the service and get better men for the extremely important positions of heads of these branches.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The only recommendation we get from them for efficiency is promotion to a higher rank.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. It does not affect the promotion of anybody except the promotion of the colonel to a brigadier to fill the vacancy.

Mr. CONNERY. If the gentleman will yield, in line with what General SPEAKS has just said, I want to say that at Camp Devens last summer the boys were all lined up and singing to the tune "We have no bananas," "Yes, we have no privates." [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] hit the nail on the head when he said they are going to commission a good many more colonels than we need; at least some additional ones. I am willing to follow our colleague from Ohio, General SPEAKS, because he knows, and he says we have now too many of the higher officers—too many colonels, too many brigadiers, and too many major generals.

I am reminded of what happened in my office the other day. A distinguished-looking gentleman came in, introduced himself as Colonel ———, a retired Army officer, and told me he wanted me to vote for the new retirement pay bill for Army officers. I asked him how old he was, and he said he was 63. He looked as young as I do, appeared to be in as good health as I am, and looked to be as strong and vigorous. He said he had been retired already two years, and said he was not getting enough money from the Government. I said, "How much do you receive, Colonel, from the Government of the United States?" He said, "I just receive $354 a month." I said, "You ought to be the happiest man on God's earth; you are just 63 years old, able-bodied, and in fine health, and you have been retired two years, and you are getting $350 every month of the year, and you are doing nothing on earth." Now, there are too many of that kind.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does the gentleman take into consideration the fact of what this gentleman has done in the past?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. That he has been under a good deal of a strain?

Mr. BLANTON. Not any more strain than the Members of Congress undergo. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYLAN. That he has been under a strain that almost took life itself?

Mr. BLANTON. Perhaps.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman does not compare the everyday, prosaic life of a Member of Congress with that of a colonel?

Mr. BLANTON. They do not live under half the strain of life that we do. According to our distinguished colleague from Ohio, General SHERWOOD, the death rate of the higher officers in the last war was not as great as the death rate of the membership of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEFALD. Does the gentleman think that the colonel is on a par with the fireman the gentleman from Kansas spoke of?

Mr. BLANTON. The railroad fireman is well off, because he has got a job for life.

Mr. WEFALD. A colonel does not do half the work?

Mr. BLANTON. We must revise and reduce the retirement pay of officers in the Army and Navy and force them to contribute to their own retirement fund. They are getting too much retirement pay for the services they render. The idea of paying a retired man, able-bodied and in good health, at 61 years of age, the age at which this colonel retired, $350 a month, three-fourths of his pay and allowances!

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is the gentleman in touch with this equalization program the Navy is now reporting that will require retirement considerably sooner than at present?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. And they will get that through. They will have some friend on the Naval Affairs Committee get up here—not the chairman of the committee but some particular friend—get up and offer from the floor an amendment, subject to a point of order; but the chairman will sit in his seat and not make the point of order against it, as in this case, and nobody in the House will know anything about it except the distinguished gentleman who introduces it, and it will pass.

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand they propose retirement at 62 instead of 64.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and nobody here will know anything about the gentleman's amendment except the gentleman himself.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I think every member of the committee knows.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did not the gentleman have the committee put it in the bill? Why did he wait until the bill came up and offer the amendment from the floor? Why did the chairman have to ask the gentleman so many questions about the nature of this amendment? Why did not he put his amendment in the bill?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This committee is luckily not to be discharged.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact this bill passed the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman could have killed this amendment with a point of oder, if he had made it.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT]. As I understand it, this amendment is simply for the purpose of making an adjustment in the law so that the heads of sections, under the present national plan of defense, can be provided for in an orderly way without disrupting the list of brigadier generals on duty in the field and otherwise. That is about all that it amounts to, is it not?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. It is to appoint a brigadier general, staff service, without losing a brigadier general.

Mr. JEFFERS. From the field?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Let me again repeat. If this amendment is adopted and the bill is adopted it would not lead to an increased number of brigadier generals.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the amendment it is merely a remedial or perfecting amendment which is needed in conjunction with the present plan of national defense. For the first time in the history of the Nation we have had, since 1921, a comprehensive plan of national defense, for the proper functioning of which the Chief of Staff is responsible. Now, no plan as great as the present plan of national defense could be expected to be perfect or to function perfectly from the very beginning without proper adjustments and amendments from time to time, and here is a situation which the Chief of Staff has come up against and he needs this perfecting amendment, and since we are holding him responsible for the smooth working of this great plan, I think we ought to grant this perfecting amendment to the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In keeping with the modernization of the Military Establishment as the gentleman suggests, does not the gentleman believe that this new General Staff and new establishment should keep pace with the times and so improve methods of warfare rather than to retard them for the sake of holding so many high ranking officials?

Mr. JEFFERS. Well, I think this is a step looking toward improvement. I think it is needed and I think it is clearly meritorious.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let us hope so.

Mr. JEFFERS. I do hope so and believe so, and therefore I am for the amendment, and hope it will pass.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, since the question of retirement and retirement pay has been brought up, I want at this time to call attention to section 9 of this bill. Now, some of you will probably remember—those of you who were here in 1917—that the war risk insurance act when it was first brought before the Congress was written upon the central idea that compensation for disability should be paid according to the rank and pay of the officer and enlisted man, also that pay to the dependents of deceased officers and enlisted men should be graded in the same manner. Now, that was an unprecedented step on the part of the American Government. It was a new departure, and when the bill was before the House I drew a series of amendments which struck out the whole unequal and discriminatory percentage plan and followed the uniform policy that our Nation has always followed, to compensate the dependents of the deceased officer or enlisted man upon an equal footing, and the House by an almost unanimous vote adopted my whole series of amendments and the Senate accepted them and they were written into the law. Ever since then there has been one effort after another made to break down the decision of Congress at that time and engraft upon the law one exception after another, and several of them have already passed the House in first one way and then the other. Each such exception seems as a precedent for another. At the last session the Senate passed what is known as the Bursum bill, which if it had been adopted by the House would have put every officer who had incurred 30 per cent disability upon the retired list and would have paid him officer's retirement pay for the rest of his life.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman believe that all emergency officers who are disabled should receive the same retirement or compensation as the Regular Army officer who was disabled to exactly the same extent?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The retirement act for Regular Army officers was written before I ever came to Congress. If I were rewriting the whole retirement act, if I had it in my power, I would make many changes in it. It is now entirely too burdensome to the taxpayers of the Nation and will become increasingly so as time goes on. The gentleman from New York will not get me to support one proposition because some Congress in the past enacted some other one which is not defensible.

The thing to do is to correct some of the mistakes of the present Army officers' retirement act and not multiply them by adding on more discriminatory features as section 9 of this present bill would do.

Section 9 ought to be stricken out of the bill. Congress did pass a law in 1920 for those enlisted men of the Regular Army who served as commissioned officers during the war and retired during the war because of disability. Congress passed a law allowing them to draw the retired pay of warrant officers. They were men retired during the war because of disabilities received during the war.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I have five minutes more?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that at the termination of the five minutes asked for by the gentleman from Texas all debate on this section and amendments thereto close.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that at the termination of five minutes all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. There were 325 enlisted men of the Regular Army who were thus retired during the war and were placed upon the retired list with the pay of warrant officers. But since the war and up to now there are 464 who have been retired, and they want to be put on the pay roll as retired warrant officers. That is the purpose of section 9; retired, if you please, since the war closed. There is no requirement that they are retired because of injuries received during the war; not at all. I do not know what they were retired for. The Members of this House do not know what they were retired for. All we know is that if we pass section 9 of this bill these 464 men will be immediately placed upon the retired list as warrant officers, and their retired pay will be increased $250 a year, and will add $120,000 per annum at the expense of the taxpayers. The committee itself admits that while that will be the first year's cost of section 9, they will not undertake to estimate how much it may cost and how large the increased expenditure may go in some future years.

Now, gentlemen, if we do not quit this extravagance in retired pay of Army officers and Navy officers and Government civilians; if we do not quit it, pretty soon everybody in the United States will be working for the Government. We who are not directly on the pay roll will be working for those who are on the pay roll. [Applause.] It is getting time we were bringing some check to bear on this retirement extravagance, and I am going to offer an amendment to strike out section 9 of this bill, and I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have another amendment to offer.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the pending amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 4, line 5, after the word "corps," insert "Ordnance Department and Chemical Warfare Service."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, this amendment will not increase the commissioned personnel. It will not cost one penny. It is simply to correct and make possible something that is necessary in the Army organization. The Chemical Warfare Service to-day is practically all located at Edgewood Arsenal, in New Jersey, and to require them to send out with troops the personnel of that arsenal will destroy what you have of Chemical Warfare Service. As a matter of fact, it is a physical impossibility, because as your Army is organized at the present time they have not units out with the troops at all. It is a purely technical branch, which is and should be kept at Edgewood Arsenal. The same is true with respect to the Ordnance Department. That should be included with the Medical Department, as the amendment calls for.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What does the gentleman's amendment do? Does it add to the Medical Department unit?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No. It simply exempts the Medical Corps, the Ordnance Corps, and the Chemical Warfare Service from the provision which requires them to be sent out with the troops. It comes in on line 5 after the Medical Corps.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I understand, so far as the Ordnance is concerned, that it is eminently proper that that should be so. I do not know so much about the Chemical Warfare. Has the gentleman conferred with the Army officers in regard to that?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, certainly. They asked for other branches to be exempted, which we refused to do. Our attention was called to the fact that it was a physical impossibility to comply with the present provisions of the law as to the Ordnance and Chemical unit, and so we ask it here.

Mr. TILSON. But the Chemical Warfare is a fighting service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman thinks that that is a correct amendment?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; I think it is all right.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment that I want to offer after the Wainwright amendment is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is pending. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG: Page 4, at the end of the Wainwright amendment, change the period to a colon and add the following:

"Provided, That in time of peace no officer of the Army shall be or remain detailed in the War Department more than five out of any period of seven consecutive years."

Mr. McKENZIE. I have no objection to letting that go to conference.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That said national defense act, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, further amended by inserting therein, immediately after section 37 thereof, a new section, to be known as section 38, in lieu of original section 38 struck out by section 31 of the amendatory act of June 4, 1920, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 38. Commissions of reserve officers: All persons appointed reserve officers shall be commissioned in the Army of the United States. Officers of the National Guard, federally recognized as such under the provisions of this act, who are appointed reserve officers under the provisions of section 37 of this act, shall be appointed for the period during which such recognition shall continue in effect and terminating at the expiration thereof in lieu of the five-year period hereinbefore prescribed, and in time of peace shall be governed by such special regulations appropriate for this class of reserve officers as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the House did not realize the importance of the last amendment, that was just passed, and I believe the attention of the House ought to be called to it, because the older Members of the House will remember that it took many years of struggle in this House before you passed the law which required officers assigned to desk jobs to go back to troops every four years. The amendment which you have just passed destroys that law.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, I yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I hope I am.

Mr. McKENZIE. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] does not repeal the Manchu law, but the effect of it, as I understand it, would be this——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It just changes it.

Mr. McKENZIE. No; it does not do that. It just takes in the officers who are now subject to the Manchu law and provides that they must also go out.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman pleases, the law now is that after four years of assignment an officer must be returned to troops—is not that correct?

Mr. McKENZIE. He can be reappointed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; he must go back to troops.

Mr. McKENZIE. No. Take the Surgeon General of the Army.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let us except the Surgeon General and let us take the line officers. A line officer, after four years' assignment, is ordered back to troops. That is the law, and the amendment which you have just passed permits them to stay five years out of seven. And if that is not destroying the very purpose of the Manchu law, I do not know what it is.

Mr. BEGG. Does not the gentleman think he is a wee bit late in raising his criticism?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I wanted to see the maneuvering and tactics that the chairman of this committee adopted.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will yield, I will simply say to the gentleman from New York that if he will just contain himself until this law is finally written he will probably find out that the chairman of the committee has not been maneuvering for any other purpose than that of protecting the Military Establishment and the Government of the United States, and when we get through I think the gentleman will say it is a good job.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought we were legislating here. I do not know what else we are doing.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; we were legislating to go to conference.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I think there has been too much of legislating in conference in the last few weeks. You will have a little taste of that when your tax bill comes back.

I hope the House will reconsider that, and when the bill is up for passage I am going to ask for a separate vote on that very important and vital amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's time for that has passed, because we are in the House now.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Can we not have a separate vote on an amendment in the House?

Mr. BLANTON. No.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Well, we will have to defeat it some way.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman from New York does not know what it is all about yet.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I do know what it is all about, and the gentleman from Ohio knows what it is all about.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I am so thoroughly impressed by the earnestness of the gentleman from New York in stating that this amendment practically kills the law which compels a fellow to take his heels off of a desk once every four years and go out in the field that I am almost inclined to say that there are not enough of us here to consider such an important proposition.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will say to my friend from Nebraska that it has been considered.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. But we are going to vote upon it pretty soon, and we ought to have more, if that is the case, so, Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, upon being more accurately advised concerning the situation, for the moment I withdraw the suggestion of no quorum. [Applause.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the purpose for which I took the floor was to call the attention of the House to the method employed in certain sections of the country in commissioning officers in the reserve. Now, the backbone of our Military Establishment is the reserve, and I believe the gentlemen of the committee will agree with me on that.

It has come to my attention that in certain sections of the country capable, able, and efficient men who served in the World War, and with brilliant military records, are turned down, while men with certain influences, local, if you please, or departmental, in some cases, are appointed to high rank. I know of cases in New York City where men have been appointed to high rank without examination. I have a case in mind out in Ohio, in the gentleman's State [Mr. BEGG], of one of the most efficient young officers who served in the American Expeditionary Forces. Owing to local conditions that young man's application for a commission in the Engineer Corps was turned down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And the excuse presented was so flimsy that it was ridiculous. This man served with me in the Aviation Service. He brought order out of chaos at aviation headquarters; he coordinated the whole service in France. He was awarded a distinguished-service medal; he was efficient in every sense of the word, and yet they turned him down on the pretext that he was not a civil engineer, when the greater percentage of the officers commissioned in the Engineer Corps are not civil engineers. One of them was a salesman, the other was a draftsman, and so on. I have the entire list.

If the War Department expects the cooperation of this House, and they ought to have it, of course, and if we are going to build up a reserve force in this country, the thing to do is to let the department know that we will not stand for the playing of favorites, for the selecting of these young officers through political or social influence, and that we expect them to maintain a high standard of efficiency in the reserve force and fairness and impartiality in the selection of the reserve personnel.

The trouble is, gentlemen, you are coddling these men and instead of making soldiers out of them you are making politicians out of them. You have just passed an amendment that will go a long way toward keeping these departmental politicians in Washington. Leave them here five years; and you talk about lobbies! Why, they will be around here lobbying all the time, and they will build up their little departmental cliques, and they will not run the department for the good of the Military Establishment, but according to their own views and their own comforts and their own interests.

I appeal to the House, and I want to say right now that I am going to follow up this case from Ohio, and if the department wants to make a test of it, I will show where men were appointed lieutenant colonels and colonels who were absolutely incompetent to hold the rank in case of an emergency. I do not object to a colonelcy being handed here and there for local reasons. That is all right. I suppose they have to do it, but I do say, in the main, they ought to give due credit to military record in the war, and they ought to give due credit to a man's age and his ability. I have complained to The Adjutant General about the case I have mentioned here, and I expect to follow it up. I do hope that in legislating for the reserve corps—and there is nothing more important to the national defense than our reserve force—we will at least so legislate as to build up a reserve force and not a departmental-military-political machine.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Mr. Speaker, simply for expedition, I ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD, so it will be in the RECORD to-morrow, proposed legislation and present law and a statement from the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor relative to seamen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this request involve a large mass of material?

Mr. RAKER. I suppose it will cover about four or five pages.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What is the gentleman's object?

Mr. RAKER. The matter will be squarely before the House to vote on to-morrow.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The vote will be on accepting the conference report. It will not be a matter of going into all this detail.

Mr. RAKER. It will be discussed, and my purpose was to have the information in parallel columns so that the House might know the full situation and the status as to the laws that exist now and the proposed legislation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, let me see what the gentleman intends to put in and perhaps later on I shall not object.

Mr. RAKER. I would have to go to the office and it will take me a couple of hours to get it ready. If the gentleman thinks it will delay the disposition of the matter I will forego the pleasure until after the conference report is through, but I want to get it printed in full before we get through.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman's presence here is very important on the matter we are considering now and the gentleman ought not to have to leave to go to his office, and therefore, I think, for the present I shall object.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

I do not expect to consume more than a couple of minutes. It does strike me that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGUARDIA] in his remarks might perhaps be easily misunderstood.

I do not know whether favoritism is shown in the selection of these commissioned officers of the reserve corps or not, but I do know that if we can not trust the Army to select the reserve officers on merit, then we had better begin to revise the Army, and the gentleman's remarks to me are such a common experience that I could not help but call attention to the fact that every time there is an appointment of any kind to be made that comes under the jurisdiction of a Congressman or otherwise, the defeated candidate for that particular office always says the selection was not fair.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. In referring to the gentleman's own State, he said a reserve officer from Ohio was turned down. I do not know whether he refers to a friend of mine who tried very diligently to get into the Army and could not qualify——

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Oh, this man had a great military record.

Mr. BEGG. Well, I said he could not qualify, and that is what I mean.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Evidently we are not talking about the same man.

Mr. BEGG. He could not qualify to the point of being selected. That does not mean anything against the man. It simply means that those charged with the responsibility of selecting the officer were more impressed with some other candidate.

My good friends, I think with all the cries and criticism against the Government we are hearing on every side, and most of it without foundation, we Members of the House ought to be very careful about charging the departments with being unfair, unless we have the goods to back it up. In the gentleman's example, it is just the gentleman's judgment against those authorized by law to select the various men in the Army, and I deplore the fact that we criticize destructively too many times on our own prejudice, and the populace read it in the RECORD and they go out and say that everything is wrong.

I do not make these remarks with any thought of criticizing or chastising my good friend from New York. I simply think we ought to be more careful.

Mr. WEFALD. Does the gentleman want to leave the inference that these men are appointed like postmasters are appointed?

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman from New York indicated that.

Mr. WEFALD. Are they appointed in that way?

Mr. BEGG. I do not know. I never went to the department and asked for the appointment of any man either in the Army or out of it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman does not know how does he know that the complaints of the gentleman from New York are unfounded?

Mr. BEGG. Well, the gentleman from New York did not offer any evidence.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 90 of said national defense act, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 90. That funds allotted by the Secretary of War for the support of the National Guard shall be available for the purchase and issue of forage, bedding, shoeing, and veterinary services, and supplies for the Government animals issued to any organization, and for animals owned or hired by any State, Territory, District of Columbia, or National Guard organization, not exceeding the number of animals authorized by Federal law for such organization and used solely for military purposes, and for the compensation of competent help for the care of material, animals, armament, and equipment of organizations of all kinds, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That the men to be so compensated shall not exceed five for each organization, except heavier-than-air squadrons, for each of which a maximum of 10 to be so compensated is hereby authorized, and shall, save as otherwise provided in the next succeeding proviso, be duly enlisted therein and detailed by the organization commander, and shall be paid by the United States disbursing officer in each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia: Provided further, That whenever it shall be found impracticable to secure the necessary competent enlisted caretakers for the material, animals, armament, or equipment of any organization from the duly enlisted personnel thereof, the organization commander may employ one civilian caretaker therefor who shall be entitled to such compensation as may be fixed by the Secretary of War."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in section 5 provision is made for forage for animals of the National Guard aside from those owned by the Government to cover those hired by the Government. It developed during the hearings on the appropriation bill that the National Guard had quite a number of animals that were neither owned nor hired but were loaned to the guard. For instance, the Government animals are not sufficient to horse the entire company and in many instances residents in the locality have loaned animals to the Government, and they must be foraged at the Government's expense. That is right, and we appropriated a certain sum in the appropriation bill. It seems to me that in order to cover that in the law there ought to be a provision here to cover animals that are loaned. It is economy for the Government to have the animals loaned to the National Guard. I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 14, after the word "organization," insert "for animals loaned to the National Guard."

Mr. McKENZIE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have an amendment to the amendment. At the end of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas insert the words "Provided, The horses are used for no other purpose than military purposes."

Mr. McKENZIE. I can not accept that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You do not want to feed horses for joy riding, do you?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I think if the gentleman will read the section he will see that his amendment is unnecessary. It provides in lines 17 and 18 that all of the horses shall be used solely for military purposes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is a limitation upon all of them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then, why do you object to my amendment?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Because it is already in there and is not necessary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, let us have the whole provision read as it will appear with the amendment inserted.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask unanimous consent that the sentence to which the amendment is offered be read as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 90. That funds allotted by the Secretary of War for the support of the National Guard shall be available for the purchase and issue of forage, bedding, shoeing, and veterinary services, and supplies for the Government animals issued to any organization, for animals loaned to the National Guard, and for animals owned or hired by any State, Territory, District of Columbia, or National Guard organization, not exceeding the number of animals authorized by Federal law for such organization and used solely for military purposes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, section 6 has already been enacted into law in the bill H. R. 8886. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the reading of section 6 be omitted and the section stricken from the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That pursuant to section 63 of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, the First Corps Cadets, antedating, and continuously existing in the State of Massachusetts since, the act of May 8, 1792, now designated as the Second Battalion, Two hundred and eleventh Artillery, Antiaircraft, Coast Artillery Corps, First Corps Cadets, Massachusetts National Guard, hereby declared to be such a corps as is defined in said section 63 for all the purposes thereof and now incorporated in the Organized Militia and a part of the National Guard of Massachusetts, shall be allowed to retain its ancient privileges and organization. Said First Corps Cadets is hereby further declared to be entitled to a lieutenant colonel in command, and a major second in command; and said officers, when federally recognized, shall receive, in accordance with the provisions of said national defense act, and the pay readjustment act of June 10, 1922, the pay of their respective grades: Provided, That nothing in this section or other provisions of law shall be deemed to be in derogation of any other ancient privileges to which said First Corps Cadets is entitled under the laws, customs, or usages of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. What are the ancient privileges that we are extending here?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The only ancient privilege in regard to this particular organization is the right of a battalion in time of peace to have two commanding officers, a lieutenant colonel and a major. The only object is that when they go out on maneuvers or training they may take along the lieutenant colonel as well as a major.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. It is not only that but it is to attend the governor in certain ceremonies and to wear a certain uniform.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it a serviceable uniform for field purposes?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. It is absolutely. This organization not only served in the Civil War but in the late war, and the only change is that a battalion usually has a major for a commandant, but they want a lieutenant colonel. The Comptroller recognizes him as a major, and this is to do away with the ruling of the Comptroller General.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, in time of emergency if they were ordered in the field, they would be subject as other troops.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. They are part of the National Guard, subject to federalization like other troops.

Mr. McKENZIE. This was written in the law, and the question was raised by the comptroller.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, with reference to the gentleman's historical statement I notice he omitted any reference to the War of 1812. Was that because this organization shared the common view of Massachusetts in that struggle? [Laughter.]

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I did not think it would interest the gentleman.

Mr. JEFFERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Did the gentleman say two commanding officers?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. They had a lieutenant colonel from the beginning. This section only applies to this organization, which has been in continuous existence since 1792, and this is one of the purposes of their organization so far as two commanding officers are concerned. This is the First Corps of Cadets of Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the first paragraph of section 110 of said national defense act, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 110. Pay for National Guard enlisted men: Each enlisted man belonging to an organization of the National Guard, other than enlisted men of the sixth and seventh grades, shall receive compensation at the rate of one-thirtieth of the initial monthly pay of his grade in the Regular Army, and each of those of the sixth and seventh grades shall receive compensation as is provided in section 14 of the pay adjustment act of June 10, 1922, for each drill ordered for his organization where he is officially present and in which he participates for not less than one and one-half hours, not exceeding eight in any one calendar month and not exceeding 60 drills in one year: Provided, That the proviso contained in section 92 of this act shall not operate to prevent the payment of enlisted men actually present at any duly ordered drill or other exercise: Provided further, That periods of any actual military duty equivalent to the drills herein prescribed (except those periods of service provided for in sections 94, 97, 99, and 101 of the national defense act, as amended) may be accepted as service in lieu of such drills when so provided by the Secretary of War: And provided further, That any enlisted man shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, receive compensation under the provisions of this section for any drill had in accordance with such provisions where he is officially present and in which he participates for not less than one and one-half hours with a National Guard organization within the same State at a station other than his own, upon presentation of a certificate in form prescribed in said regulations from the organization commander to the commanding officer of the organization of which he is a member showing such drill participation."

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the numbers may be changed in the bill to conform with the striking out of section 6.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to change the numbers in the bill as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That retired enlisted men of the Army heretofore or hereafter retired who served honorably as commissioned officers of the Army of the United States at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, shall be entitled to receive the pay of retired warrant officers of the Army; and retired enlisted men of the regular Navy and Marine Corps heretofore or hereafter retired who served honorably as commissioned officers, regular, temporary, or reserve, in the naval service at some time between the aforesaid dates, and who at the time of their retirement were members of the regular Navy or Marine Corps, shall be entitled to receive the pay of retired warrant officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, respectively: Provided, That such enlisted man retired prior to July 1, 1922, shall be entitled to receive the pay provided by law for retired warrant officers of equal length of service retired prior to that date, and that any such enlisted man retired subsequent to June 30, 1922, shall be entitled to receive the pay provided by law for retired warrant officers of equal length of service retired subsequent to that date: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall operate to prevent any person from receiving the pay and allowances of his grade, rank, or rating on the retired list when such pay and allowances exceed the pay to which he would be entitled under this act by virtue of his commissioned service.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: Page 10, line 16, strike out all of section 9, on pages 10 and 11.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, awhile ago I called the attention of the House to the fact that if this section is adopted it will have the effect of engrafting one more exception to the general principle of the war risk insurance act, to the effect that the same payment should be made for disabilities incurred in the service to a private as is paid to an officer. I am not in the habit of trying to give the House any warning or undertake to offer any superior advice; but if this section remains in the bill you will find that it will be offered as a precedent to bring pressure upon the Committee on Military Affairs to report out the so-called Bursum bill, which provides that every man who served in the World War as a commissioned officer and who was disabled to the extent of 30 per cent shall be placed on the retired list and shall be retired at the rank that he held while in the service. Under that Bursum bill, if a man served as a captain and has a rating of 30 per cent disability he would be retired at a compensation of $150 per month for the rest of his life. Now, in the few remarks I made awhile ago I called your attention to the fact that 325, I believe it is, of these enlisted men who were actually retired during the World War were retired as warrant officers, and we are not seeking to disturb them; but 464 have been retired since the war closed, and the purpose of this section is to take up these 464 men and say, "Gentlemen, we will place you on the retired list as warrant officers and increase your retired pay $250 per annum," or a total expenditure of $120,000 a year. Now, gentlemen, before we do that let me submit this: We already have the most liberal and generous retirement law of any nation in the world. Is there a Member on the floor of the House who will dispute that fact?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. If the gentleman will give way——

Mr. BLACK of Texas. In a moment. These 464 men have all been retired upon full retirement pay as enlisted men. Are we justified in adding this $120,000 to the already bended backs of the taxpayers? I ask you that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I ask that I may have two more minutes, and then I shall yield to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Let me give the gentleman this instance. I will give an actual instance of two noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army, both of whom were commissioned as majors, one in The Adjutant General's Department and one in the Quartermaster General's Department, both in combat divisions. One of them gets his discharge and is retired as a warrant officer. The other was not quite through with soldiering and elected to stay for five or six years, and when he comes to be retired, being then a master sergeant, he retires as a master sergeant. Does not the gentleman think it is fair he should have exactly the same pay, the same distinction, and the same recognition from his Government as the other man?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Let me give the gentleman this answer by citing an example myself which I think will exactly cover the case. Congress passed an Army and Navy pay bill here two or three years ago. I thought it was unduly extravagant in some of its pay provisions and I voted against it. I had a few days ago an Army officer in my office, and he said, "I retired before that pay bill was passed, and I think you gentlemen ought to amend the law so as to go back and increase all our pay to equal all who have retired since the Army retirement act was passed." What does the gentleman from New York think about that? If we do that sort of thing there will never be any end to the drain on the Treasury.

The Bible says that broad is the way to destruction and many there be who travel it, and that narrow is the way which leads to life eternal and few there be that follow it.

The way to reduce taxation, and the only way, is the straight and narrow path of economy, and my experience is that few there be that travel it. The way to waste and extravagance is the broad highway of increased appropriations, and many there be that follow it.

The country is not going to get much relief from taxation until the situation is reversed.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am a member of this committee, and I have decided to say nothing except what I believe to be vital. This section 9 in the Senate bill is a great, big snake that slips in there for the purpose of giving a special privilege to a lot of men in the Army and Navy who call themselves warrant officers. This Congress has been just and fair, according to my construction, to the Regular soldiers of this last war; and those men in the Regular service should expect the law to be applied to their retirement just the same as if there had been no war.

Now they come up, because they happened to be in the Regular Army and Navy before entering into the World War, and ask a special privilege at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States. It is time for the Congress to take note of all these little apparently insignificant sections that creep into these measures. Already crowding around the doors of the Committee on Military Affairs there is a bunch of warrant officers who want to have their pay raised; great hordes of them; so much so that they actually come around and lobby for the provisions they desire. This is just another one of them.

They reported out here a bill to give a special privilege to officers who stayed in the Regular Army after the war is over, men who went into the war during the years 1917 and 1918 above 45 years of age, whereas the Committee on Military Affairs passed a bill, which became a law, providing that all of that age who stayed in the Army should not be retired because of physical disability on the pay of Regular Army officers. Yet that bill to favor those men who stayed in the service knowing they could not be retired on the Regular Army officer retirement pay is reported out to this House, and they expect you to pass it. So you see how they are edging up on you on all occasions.

Now, where do the taxpayers of the country come in? We must have some regard for the people who pay the taxes. If you go out and put on the retired list all those who happen to hold a job in the Army or Navy or in the civil service, you place them on the backs of the people who toil. I can not see a more pitiful picture than the farmer who toils in his fields all day, bowed down with his cares and his work, when I realize that he has a whole horde of Government Army officials and employees on his back.

This section 9 grants a special privilege that is not deserved to these men who held those positions, and when you vote for it, you vote to take out of the pockets of the laboring people of this country their hard-earned money to give to these people who have been well paid for their services in positions which they accepted themselves as their chosen pursuit in life. They were enlisted men in the Regular Army and Navy and Marine Corps, and when the United States entered the World War they were made noncommissioned officers. After the war they were demoted to privates, and now, as they retire as privates, you propose to retire them not on the retirement pay of privates but on the noncommissioned officer pay. It is wrong. This section involves an additional expense of $120,000 a year. Multiply that by 40 years and see what it amounts to. By and by we shall be in the hands of the Philistines. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It will cost $120,000 the first year, and the committee itself says it does not know what it will cost in future years.

Mr. QUIN. Yes. It will just keep on growing as the number will grow. It is just like moss growing on a tree. It first starts on one limb, and then it spreads over other limbs, and before you know it the whole tree is covered. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. May I have two additional minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. I call on you, Members of the House, to strike out section 9. If you do not do that, we ought to kill the whole bill, although the balance of the bill is good, except the Begg amendment.

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. STENGLE. I believe the gentleman wants to be fair, and so far as he has gone on the other lines I am with him; but he made a misstatement a while ago when he said that the civil employees of this Government are a burden on the backs of the toilers. I want to inform the gentleman that they pay for their pensions, and they now have on hand a reserve fund of $40,000,000.

Mr. QUIN. They pay only part of it; but the rest of it comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers. Do you think there is a civil-service pension in this country where the employees pay it all themselves? That would be nothing but Government insurance. The taxpayers of the country are contributing largely to that fund. The gentleman from New York ought to inform himself. All the people in these lines are getting paid at the expense of the hard-working people of the country. The man who lives in idleness in his gilded palace and has a limousine to ride in gets the taxes on his wealth necessarily from the labor of those who toil, either in the workshops or in the mills or in the stores, offices, or on the farms of the Republic. For one, I am going to vote to relieve, wherever I can, the taxpayers of the country from such burdens. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take the time of the House further than to say that this bill is intended to give to all enlisted men in the Army who served during the World War the rank of warrant officer, whether they served during the World War as commissioned or as noncommissioned officers. As the gentleman from Texas has said, several hundred of them retired while still holding their commissions. Several hundred more were forced back into the ranks and now are being retired as enlisted men. This provision would give to all of them the retired pay of a warrant officer. The only question involved, to be determined by the Members of this House, is whether or not we wish to give this additional compensation, which will amount to about $120,000, I am informed, to these old enlisted men.

It is not a question that requires debate. My position on retirement is well known in this House. I have insisted and I have endeavored to get some of my good friends to get a joint committee appointed to work out an entire retirement system. The present system, in my judgment, is wrong, and up to this time such a joint committee, as I have suggested, has not been appointed. But until we have a different system, a system that will be more equitable and just, a system that recognizes retirement for disability rather than for age or every other excuse that can be thought of, almost, we must get along in the same old rut. I can see no reason why it would not be an act of justice and fairness, at least, to give these men the same pay in the meantime, and let Congress get down to business later and work out a system that will be just and equitable to all.

Mr. LaGUARDIA rose.

Mr. McKENZIE. Let us have a vote. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto end in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, in this instance I agree with the chairman of the committee, and I hope that that amendment will be voted down. There was no more useful service rendered in the entire war than the service of these experienced noncommissioned officers. But the gentleman from Texas couples with his amendment notice to the House that he is opposed to a bill, which we hope to bring before the House very shortly, providing equal compensation for all disabled officers of the World War.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Is the gentleman in favor of disturbing the principle we wrote into the war risk insurance act, to wit, that the same pay should be paid to a private who was disabled, and for the same disability, as is paid to an officer? Does the gentleman desire to disturb that principle?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. That is not the principle in existence today, because, I submit to the gentleman, you are paying compensation to disabled officers in accordance with their rank if they happen to be members of the Regular organization, but you refuse to pay the same compensation to a boy holding the same rank and with exactly the same disability if he happens to be a volunteer.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. In time of war, of course, it is necessary to have a large emergency force?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Absolutely.

Mr. McKENZIE. Men are called into that emergency force, and some of them are made officers, while others are privates.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes; and some get shot and some stay in Washington. Some go to fight and some get a cost-plus contract.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman think it is right to give one of those men much more than is given to others?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I do not. I pleaded with the gentlemen yesterday when this House considered "war services" in the bill we passed yesterday. I asked then not to give one more than another. What were the "war services" that were considered yesterday? We took some property from some bondholders during the war and yesterday you were very solicitous in seeing that you gave those bondholders just compensation, and you did not stint on the compensation either. You gave them more than 100 cents on the dollar. You took a business venture that was a failure and you are paying 100 cents plus on the dollar for every bond and for every certificate of stock issued. You are not only going to pay for the water in the canal but also for the water, and there is plenty of it, in the stock. Now, if we are going to have a principle and if we are going to treat them all on the $30-a-month basis, let us do it. But let us not talk about that principle when considering disabled officers or retired soldiers, and disregard it when we vote millions to contractors, profiteers, and financial experts.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman knows I voted against that proposition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I was with the gentleman, so we agree on that. I am sure that the gentleman from Texas, on reflection, will see the injustice of the present system in giving one officer one rate of compensation and another officer another rate of compensation. So I hope that when that bill does come before the House—and it should come very soon, because gentlemen will remember that in the last Congress we could not get that bill out of the committee——

Mr. JEFFERS. If the gentleman will permit I would like to make this observation: That not only are the Regular Army officers retired for disability received during their war service but also the provisional Regular Army officers, the regular and emergency naval officers and the regular and emergency marine officers. So we have seven classes of officers—the Regular Army officers, the provisional officers in the Regular Army, the marine regular and emergency officers, and the naval regular and emergency officers. Those six classes are retired, while the disabled emergency officers of the Army are the only ones out of seven classes so discriminated against.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly. My colleague and buddy [Mr. JEFFERS] is right. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is so fair that I am certain if we ever do get that bill before the House he will help us put it through. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK of Texas) there were—ayes 24, noes 34.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (after counting). Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 60, nays 217, not voting 155, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANTHONY: Page 11, after section 9, add the following as a new section:

"SEC. 10. Payments of commutation for the additional rations provided for certain noncommissioned officers by the act of May 18, 1920, and the act of June 4, 1920, made after July 1, 1922, to noncommissioned officers of the National Guard receiving pay under the provisions of sections 94, 97, and 99 of the national defense act, as amended, and remaining uncollected are hereby authorized to be credited in the disbursing officers' accounts in which they now appear."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment just offered is to correct the status of a number of the accounts of disbursing officers of the National Guard in various States whose expenditures for the payment of rations with respect to the National Guard have been disallowed by the comptroller. Previous to the enactment of the last pay act there were two classes of specialists who were allowed certain pay as a substitute for rations. The pay act did away with that, but, nevertheless, in a few States the disbursing officers kept on making payments for these allowances for rations. The payments were authorized by the Militia Bureau. For instance, in my State the comptroller has disallowed against the disbursing officer a total of $690.89. Of that amount, $301.01 was for longevity pay, a correction of which has been made in the bill just passed this afternoon, but there has been no correction of these disallowances by the comptroller for overpayments on these rations, and if this amendment is adopted it will relieve these disbursing officers on account of having paid $389.88 allowed by the Militia Bureau in my State, and also relieve the officers in other States of small sums of this kind.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. Has the gentleman from Kansas investigated this matter and looked into it and found that the facts as stated by him are correct?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the result of my investigation at the Militia Bureau.

Mr. McKENZIE. And this is recommended by the Militia Bureau?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I have had no direct recommendation from the bureau.

Mr. McKENZIE. But they find the facts to be as stated?

Mr. ANTHONY. They say the facts are as I have stated them, and as the gentleman will recall, in the bill just previously passed, we corrected the overpayments by these disbursing officers in the instance of longevity pay, but there has been no legislation so far to correct the overpayments on the rations. If we do not reimburse these officers in this instance, the State legislatures undoubtedly will have to do it, and as the payments were authorized by the Militia Bureau and the payments made in good faith by the disbursing officers—and they are not large in amount—I think in justice to these National Guard officers Congress ought to authorize the comptroller to allow them.

Mr. McKENZIE. You think this is equitable and just?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think the judgment of the gentleman from Kansas ought to be accepted. The gentleman was on the Committee on Military Affairs a great many years and should know about these things.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SPEAKS: Page 11, line 15, after the period add the following: That section 9 of the act of June 10, 1922, is hereby amended by adding at the end of said section the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized in execution of the preceding provision to fix the pay grades hereunder of all enlisted men of the Army, retired prior to the inception on July 1, 1920, of the operation of section 4(b) of the national defense act as amended."

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that all debate on this section has been closed.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is offered with the consent of the chairman of the committee. The language is that of the War Department. The amendment in no wise affects any commissioned officer of the Army. It relates solely to enlisted men of the Army with 30 years of service, upon which they retire. When the pay bill was enacted the language in one particular was such that the comptroller by a decision held that these men could not occupy a classification which it had been intended they should have.

The language of this bill simply authorizes the Secretary of War to so classify. As I stated before, the amendment is drawn by the War Department.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: At the end of the bill insert a new paragraph as follows:

"SEC. 10. That section 11 of the national defense act of June 3, 1916 (39 Stats. pp. 173–174), as restated in modified form in section 11 of the act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stats. p. 768), is hereby amended by striking out the words 'one assistant' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'two assistants,' and by adding to said section the following: 'Provided, That one of said two assistants shall be legally eligible for assignment in charge of the public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, shall be legally eligible for assignment as superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department buildings, and shall also be legally eligible for service in the exercise of any or all functions heretofore exercised by the officer detailed to act as officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia or as superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department buildings.' That portion of the act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stats. p. 535), which prescribed that the officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel is hereby repealed."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane either to the bill or the paragraph.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, as far as the paragraph is concerned, it is a new paragraph or section. The bill is a general bill relating to a number of phases and activities of the War Department, and relates to all of the activities of the general subject of national defense. This is an amendment to section 11 of the national defense act, which is under consideration in the bill S. 2169. It seems to me the subject of the bill opens up all the general subject of the sections of the national defense act.

The SPEAKER. It does not seem to the Chair that this bill brings the whole national defense act before the House. It only brings before the House a very limited portion of it and not the portion affected by the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina. The Chair is disposed to sustain the point of order. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKENZIE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—ANSORGE AGAINST WELLER

Mr. COLE of Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 1, presented a report from that committee on the contested-election case of Ansorge against Weller, which was referred to the House Calendar.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. ROSENBLOOM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 248. A joint resolution to provide for the remission of further payments of the annual installments of the Chinese indemnity;

H. R. 1823. An act for the relief of the Long Island Railroad Co.;

H. R. 5799. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Seminole Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes;

H. R. 2878. An act to authorize the sale of lands allotted to Indians under the Moses agreement of July 7, 1883; and

H. R. 4161. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to acquire necessary rights of way across private lands, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, needed in constructing a spillway and drainage ditch to lower and maintain the level of Lake Andes, in South Dakota.

RETURN TO THE SENATE OF THE BILL H. R. 4445

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

In the Senate of the United States May 14, 1924—

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 4445) entitled "An act to amend section 115 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.'"

GEORGE SANDERSON, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be complied with.

There was no objection.

THE QUESTIONNAIRE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks on the subject of the questionnaire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the questionnaire. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Speaker, all municipal and State legislative bodies, as well as Congress, provide, first, for the printing of a bill; second, its reference to a committee where it is publicly discussed by its friends and opponents and testimony is taken as to its good and bad effects; third, the report of the bill, usually changed and amended, is then submitted to the House; fourth, a report of the revised bill, a special report of those favoring and opposing it, is sent to the Members of the House, and Members are furnished with a copy of the hearings.

The bill is then placed upon the calendar and equal time is permitted for proponents and opponents to discuss it.

It is then engrossed and read three times, and not until this has all been done do Members vote upon it.

This proceeding in Congress is followed practically in every legislative body in the United States.

Yet the author of the questionnaire seldom reads a bill; it is never given careful discussion; only the proponents of the bill are heard; usually the question is propounded at a meeting and indorsed at the same meeting. Then the question is sent to a Congressman and he is expected to answer "yes" or "no" before he has read the bill, discussed it, or heard any testimony on the subject.

The Congressman, however, is expected to pledge himself for or against a measure, according to the wishes of the propounders of the questionnaire.

This he is expected to do in advance of the meeting of Congress.

Now, contrast the method of discussion, of hearings, the care which is put upon the legislature by Municipal, State, and National laws, with the action of the author of the average questionnaire.

He demands an offhand expression of opinion from a Congressman before he has read, discussed, or heard testimony on the subject, and frequently the group behind the questionnaire vote for or against a Member of Congress on this single subject.

If this policy were pursued generally, the functions of Congress and all legislative bodies would be usurped and Congressmen would be denied the privilege of investigation, discussion, and the educational effect of debate. They would be tied and vote as automatons in the way they had pledged themselves to vote prior to even the convening of Congress.

Many of the authors of questionnaires are sincere, earnest men and women. They think they are doing right, but they are weakening the intellectual force of Congress and are in addition in many cases carried away by hearing only one side of a question; and in a majority of cases, not even having read the bill which they indorse, they indorse it upon a mere statement of what it contains.

It has been my experience that many bills seem good at first, but after hearing and discussion appear in quite a contrary light.

The same is true of other bills, which create a bad impression at the outset but upon discussion and hearing testimony they may be all right.

Then there is a third class of bills—those which are changed in committee and made acceptable. There is not one bill in a thousand presented to the House which is not changed.

And yet the questionnaire demands, in advance of a hearing, in advance of testimony, in advance of a discussion, and in advance of an opportunity for amendment, an unqualified "yes" or "no" answer on a subject which even the author of the questionnaire has not investigated and upon which he has not taken testimony nor heard evidence.

This is unfair to the public, it is unfair to Congress, and it is even unfair to many misguided men and women who thoughtlessly indorse a bill or a project which they do not understand and which they have not even examined.

Congressmen and Senators are overriden with this sort of thing. It is undermining the individuality of Congress and is harmful to a large degree.

THE PROPAGANDIST

The propagandist is another evil.

Some one presents a subject from his point of view. The other side of the question is not heard or discussed. Naturally defects and objections are glossed over, and the main object of the bill is described in a satisfactory way.

Then the propagandist proceeds to secure an indorsement and sends this indorsement to Congress, and in many cases he accompanies it by a series of petitions advocating the passage or defeat of a bill.

Not one in a thousand signers has ever read the bill or understands it. They are acting solely upon the representations made to them by the person who starts the propaganda. Usually behind this propaganda will be found some special interest.

The average Congressman desires to hear from his constituents on any measure which may be before Congress if his constituents have read the measure and understand it. He values such communications. They are of service to him. So are arguments and briefs on any subject upon which he may vote, or the statement of a practical farmer, laborer, or business man.

But when he is deluged by telegrams and letters which he knows originate in one central point and are merely copied by persons who have not read the bill or who do not understand it, he is placed in an embarrassing position.

It is impossible for him to correspond with all the signers of these petitions. He can, if he has time and at great labor, send to all these petitioners copies of the hearings and records of the debates before Congress. But time will usually not permit this to be done.

THE QUESTIONNAIRE AND THE CANDIDATE

Not to make the matter personal, I will simply say that I happen to know a Congressman who two years ago received a questionnaire containing over 30 questions. They ranged from State to National subjects. He put in nearly three days reading municipal statutes, State laws, and the National statutes, looking up cases, and then proceeded to answer the questionnaire. Some of the questions he answered favorably, some unfavorably, and on those about which he was doubtful he entered into lengthy discussions.

About the time he had concluded this three days' labor a friend came in and asked him if he had answered this particular questionnaire, and the candidate told him that he was not quite through but would finish the next day.

His friend then informed the candidate that his opponent for Congress had answered each question in the affirmative, and he further learned that every questionnaire presented to his opponent had been answered by him in the exact way he thought the promoters of the questionnaire had desired it to be answered.

The result was that the candidate refused to answer any questionnaires. He was perfectly justified in this, because if he was to be measured in the matter of vote getting by an opponent who answered "yes" to everything, he was placed at an immediate disadvantage.

In the long questionnaire above refered to it so happened that the candidates who had answered everything "yes" had a record so black, regarding the specific matters mentioned, that no particular harm had been done.

But suppose he had been an unknown man who did not care how he pledged himself and that his one pursuit was that of votes, the great injustice of this procedure can be easily seen.

Then there is another difficulty so far as the candidate is concerned. He is asked if he will vote for a certain measure and he answers "yes." Later he is confronted with a bill which may cover one portion of the subject about which he is questioned, but goes far beyond it and extends into a variety of subjects, and has a tendency altogether different from what he was led to suppose it would be.

These questionnaires usually demand a reply within a limited period.

The municipal assembly, the legislature, and Congress all permit a long period of discussion, but the questionnaire does not permit this investigation, and, in many cases, driven by the fear of loss of votes, he commits himself to a policy which is repugnant to him intellectually and bad for the country.

If the questionnaire consisted of a copy of a bill in its entirety, and the candidate was given an opportunity to read and study the bill, and then an expression of opinion was asked it would have some of the elements of fairness. But even this would not be quite fair to the candidate, because he would be deprived of the public hearing and the testimony of those who favored and opposed the bill. He would even in this case be deprived of the benefit of a discussion on the subject.

Of course, there are certain subjects and certain general principles upon which a candidate should declare himself, and he should submit, where honestly propounded, to questions in his campaign; but the average man should be content with the declaration of principles made by the party convention of which the candidate is the nominee.

The candidate himself may not understand a question propounded in these questionnaires.

Take, for instance, a question which has been propounded throughout the United States by an organization of well-meaning people couched in this language:

Will you vote for any measure which will tend to weaken a certain law?

Now, the candidate might honestly answer this question "No," and yet his idea of whether the law would be weakened by an amendment might be entirely different from that of the person preparing this question. He might be entirely honest and have a different viewpoint as to what was meant by a weakening of the law. He might think that if it was changed in a number of respects it would be strengthened, while the author of the question would think that any change would be a weakening.

The questionnaire is dangerous in itself and tends to eliminate the element of ability, the matter of sincerity, and may, in addition, cause a vote for or against a candidate on one single subject when this same candidate may have to pass upon 10,000 different bills presented to Congress containing 10,000 different subjects. He might be right on 99 out of 100 problems, but if the propaganda back of the questionnaire found him wrong in 1, they would vote against him on the 1, although he was right on 99 others.

THE REMEDY

An organization which discusses a question and hears both sides, allowing an opportunity for proponents and opponents to be heard, which provides for the hearing of testimony, debates, and the same process of discussion provided by law in municipal, State, and national organizations, might with some propriety after this kind of hearing and discussion address a candidate on the subject of securing his "yes" or "no" statement; but no organization which does not hear both sides discussed and does not proceed with the same care that the body in which the candidate votes has the right to attempt to dictate to him, especially where the decision has been arrived at hastily, unfairly, or without impartial hearing.

Instead of advancing the cause of good government, no matter what the object may be, it would be an attack upon intelligent government.

If these organizations would adopt a rule of printing their bill, setting a time for discussion, and inviting both sides to be heard, that in itself would be an improvement; but this is rarely done.

In 99 cases out of 100 only one side is heard, or a resolution, sprung at the eleventh hour in a convention, without discussion or hid away in a series of resolutions, is adopted, then made the basis of a demand upon a Congressman.

The whole proceeding is unfair to the legislative body to which the candidate belongs; it is unfair to the public; and it is even unfair to the organization which has been hastily forced into a position which it does not understand.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 15, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

474. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Illinois River, Ill., with a view to preparing plans and estimates of cost for the prevention and control of floods on said river and its tributaries, and to determine the extent to which the United States and local interests should cooperate in carrying out such plans (H. Doc. No. 276); to the Committee on Flood Control and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

SENATE

THURSDAY, May 15, 1924

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 14, 1924)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The principal clerk will call the roll.

The principal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Fernald	Ladd	Robinson
Ashurst	Fess	Lodge	Sheppard
Bayard	Fletcher	McKellar	Shields
Borah	Frazier	McKinley	Shipstead
Brandegee	George	McLean	Shortridge
Brookhart	Glass	McNary	Smith
Broussard	Gooding	Neely	Smoot
Bruce	Hale	Norbeck	Stephens
Cameron	Harreld	Norris	Sterling
Capper	Harris	Oddie	Swanson
Caraway	Harrison	Overman	Trammell
Copeland	Heflin	Owen	Wadsworth
Cummins	Howell	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Johnson, Calif.	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Dale	Johnson, Minn.	Pittman	Warren
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Ralston	Watson
Dill	Kendrick	Ransdell	Weller
Edge	Keyes	Reed, Mo.	Willis
Ernst	King	Reed, Pa.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is absent on account of illness. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is attending a meeting of a special investigating committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I desire to take this opportunity to say a few words in the nature of a personal explanation.

When the Senate voted day before yesterday on the question of whether or not it would sustain the President's veto of the pension bill I voted inadvertently "yea." Some of the newspapers have seen fit to assert and to try to create the impression that I changed my vote on the spur of the moment; that is, that I changed my opinion about how I should vote. I simply want to state for the RECORD that I made up my mind several days before that I would support the President in his veto of the pension bill.

At the time the bell rang to call Senators to the Chamber for the vote I was at lunch with my wife and some guests. I came into the Chamber while the roll was being called. Under the impression that to support the President's veto I should vote "yea," I cast that vote. Immediately afterwards, in conversation with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and others, I found that I had inadvertently voted wrong and that in order to support the President's veto I should have voted "nay." Of course, I rose immediately after the roll call had been concluded and asked that my vote be changed.

I make this statement in order that it may be understood that it was not a sudden change of mind at all on my part. I had made up my mind several days previously how I was going to vote, and it was necessary to change the vote as I did in order to carry out my purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, returned to the Senate in compliance with its request the bill (H. R. 4445) to amend section 115 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2169) to amend in certain particulars the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8886) providing for sundry matters affecting the Military Establishment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 1823. An act for the relief of the Long Island Railroad Co.;

H. R. 2878. An act to authorize the sale of lands allotted to Indians under the Moses agreement of July 7, 1883;

H. R. 4161. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to acquire necessary rights of way across private lands, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, needed in constructing a spillway and drainage ditch to lower and maintain the level of Lake Andes, in South Dakota;

H. R. 5799. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Seminole Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 248. A joint resolution to provide for the remission of further payments of the annual installments of the Chinese indemnity.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, ETC.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I submit a conference report and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8350) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, and 38, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$261,000" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$233,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 32: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$597,550"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on amendments numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 19, 21, 22, and 23.

W. L. JONES,
CHARLES CURTIS,
H. C. LODGE,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

MILTON W. SHREVE,
GEO. H. TINKHAM,
W. B. OLIVER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator having the matter in charge state what the differences were, or at least what recessions were made by the Senate conferees?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senate conferees receded on amendment No. 1. That is the amendment with reference to the Undersecretary of State. They also receded on amendment No. 2, corresponding with amendment No. 1. With reference to the amendments relating to the Department of Commerce, there was a reduction in some of the amounts. There was not a complete recession on those items.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the report represent a complete agreement?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does not.

Mr. ROBINSON. What are the amendments still in conference?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senate conferees receded from amendments Nos. 1 and 2. Amendment No. 28 is under the Department of Commerce and relates to the commercial attaché. We agreed to $261,000 instead of $291,000. Did the Senator have that particular amendment in mind?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I merely wanted to know the effect of the conference agreement and what is left in conference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. One of the items left in conference is the provision with reference to the salaries of attorneys in the Department of Justice. That had to come back to the Senate in disagreement. Upon most of the other items reported in disagreement the conferees have really agreed, but the items have to go back to the House because of the House rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. The principal outstanding controversy then relates to the salaries of attorneys in the Department of Justice?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does. There is no serious controversy with reference to that item, but the House conferees felt that they had to take it back to the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate further insist upon the amendments still in disagreement, ask for a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. ROBINSON presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from the Boston Women's Trade Union League of Boston, Mass.; the Evanston League of Women Voters, Mrs. E. L. Middleton, president, of Evanston, Ill.; Mrs. E. W. Bemis, county commissioner and director Democratic Women's Club, and the Women's Trade Union League, Agnes Nestor, president, both of Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. Walter Cope, Mrs. Samuel S. Fels, and the Consumers' League of Eastern Pennsylvania, of Philadelphia, Pa.; the Consumers' League of New York, Alice D. Jackson, president; the New York League of Women Voters, Mrs. F. Louis Slade, chairman; the New York League of Girls' Clubs, Mabel W. Krause, president; Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, and the Women's Trade Union League, of New York, praying for the passage without amendment of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 184) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to child labor, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented the petition of Alden G. Alley, lieutenant of Infantry, Organized Reserves, and 192 other citizens, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the adhesion of the United States to the protocol under which the Permanent Court of International Justice was established by the League of Nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIS presented resolutions adopted by the Toledo (Ohio) Bar Association, protesting against the passage of Senate bill 624, to amend the practice and procedure in Federal courts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. RANSDELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3161) to create the Inland Waterways Corporation for the purpose of carrying out the mandate and purpose of Congress as expressed in sections 201 and 500 of the transportation act, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 538) thereon.

Mr. HARRELD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 2875) to provide for the addition of the names of certain persons to the final roll of the Indians of the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont. (Rept. No. 544);

A bill (H. R. 4460) authorizing payment to certain Red Lake Indians, out of the tribal trust funds, for garden plats surrendered for school-farm use (Rept. No. 545);

A bill (H. R. 6298) to authorize the leasing for oil and gas mining purposes of unallotted lands on Indian reservations affected by the proviso to section 3 of the act of February 28, 1891 (Rept. No. 546); and

A bill (H. R. 6857) to provide for the addition of the names of Chester Calf and Crooked Nose Woman to the final roll of the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians, Seger jurisdiction, Oklahoma (Rept. No. 547).

Mr. HARRELD also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 731) authorizing the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians in Oklahoma to submit claims to the Court of Claims, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 548) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 3309) to establish the Mena National Park in the State of Arkansas; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A bill (S. 3310) for the relief of the owners of the barkentine Monterey; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. RALSTON:

A bill (S. 3311) for the relief of Alden H. Baker; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 3312) granting an increase of pension to Isabelle Lowen; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 3313) to provide for the widening of Park Road between Thirteenth and Sixteenth Streets NW., and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 3314) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil and Mexican Wars and to certain widows, former widows, minor children, and helpless children of said soldiers and sailors, and to widows of the War of 1812, and to certain Indian war veterans and widows, and to certain Spanish War soldiers and widows, and certain maimed soldiers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 3315) to amend section 206 of the transportation act, 1920, approved February 28, 1920; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. PEPPER:

A bill (S. 3316) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the consolidation of national banking associations," approved November 7, 1918; to amend section 5136 as amended, section 5137, section 5138 as amended, section 5142, section 5150, section 5155, section 5190, section 5200 as amended, section 5202 as amended, section 5208 as amended, section 5211 as amended, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and to amend section 9, section 13, section 22, and section 24 of the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 3317) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of Fort Vancouver, State of Washington; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 3318) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the Government of the Dominican Republic on account of the death of Juan Soriano, a Dominican subject, resulting from the landing of an airplane belonging to the United States Marine Corps at Guerra, Dominican Republic; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (S. 3319) authorizing the extension and operation of the transcontinental airplane-mail service to Boston, Mass.; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. NORBECK submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for investigating the food habits of North American birds and animals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, etc., from $508,000 to $652,240, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7220, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS

Mr. ERNST submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 224), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-eighth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths; and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT

The bill (H. R. 8886) providing for sundry matters affecting the Military Establishment was read twice by its title.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a Senate bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs now on the Senate calendar which contains the same provisions as are contained in the House bill just laid down.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the calendar number of the Senate bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Order of Business 547. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be placed on the calendar without reference to the committee, the committee having already acted upon the same matter.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the House bill identical with the Senate bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senate bill is more comprehensive, in that it contains an additional feature which the House bill does not contain.

Mr. ROBINSON. As far as the House bill goes, it is identical with the Senate bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and the House bill will be placed on the calendar.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2169) to amend in certain particulars the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate disagree to the House amendments and ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. CAMERON, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

REPORT OF COMMERCIAL COMMISSION TO SCANDINAVIA

Mr. OWEN presented a copy of his remarks made in the Senate and printed in the Appendix to the RECORD of Tuesday, February 19, 1924, relative to and including the report of the commercial commission to Scandinavia, organized and directed by the Southern Commercial Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a Senate document.

TERMS OF COURT IN WYOMING

Mr. WARREN. There is now at the desk, returned from the House, House bill 4445. I wish to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the request of the Senator?

Mr. WARREN. It has reference to a local matter concerning the courts of Wyoming. On the report submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who reported the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, the word "Yellowstone" was stricken out in several places, but in one place it seems that it was left in the bill. I asked for the passage of the bill on the basis of the report and discovered the error afterwards.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator wishes to correct an error?

Mr. WARREN. That is all. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 4445) to amend section 115 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On page 2, line 4, I move to strike out the words "and in said national park," and in the same line, after the word "such," to strike out the word "dates" and insert the word "date."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on yesterday asked me a question as to how freight rates could be reduced. I answered his question in part, and I will this morning answer it a little more fully.

The items I mentioned were watered valuation, the excess return on the bonds over the interest rate, and the capitalization of unearned increment. All of those technically, of course, go to the property account of the railroads, but, so far as the people of the United States are concerned, the sums collected for those items are from operating expenses of the railroads and are therefore chargeable to the people's operating expense account. That is what I meant by including them all in the operating expenses of railroads. Of course under the law the commission is commanded—it is not a matter of discretion with the commission itself, but it is its duty—to levy rates high enough to yield a return upon all of these items of valuation. I shall not further discuss them, because yesterday I pointed out the facts. I think, quite fully; but I mentoined the question of subsidiary corporations, and I wish to discuss that question somewhat in detail.

The profits of subsidiary corporations constitute a very great item of the operating expenses of our railroads, and those profits ought to be removed. We start out with the theory that a private concern can manage a railroad better than can anybody else, and then, as soon as we adopt that theory, the next minute it is said, "Well, a railroad can not run a sleeping-car business, so we will organize a Pullman company, an inside corporation, and it will take charge of that." Of course, incidentally, it makes a crop of millionaires and reaps an immense harvest of profits out of the operating expenses of the railroads

It is also said, "Yes; private ownership is efficient in handling the railroad business, but of course it can not operate an express company." Then another group of friends organize an express company, and they dip into the earnings of the railroads and again take great profits out of the operating expense account of the railroads.

Then it is said again, "Yes; private corporations know how to run railroads, but the telegraph business that we need on our roads we can not operate; so we must have another inside company." Accordingly the same process is followed in reference to telegraphs and telephones.

Then it is said, "Our railroad company can not operate refrigerator cars as well as can an inside concern; so let a refrigerator-car company be organized to handle that business." Such a company is organized, and it takes out of the expenses of the railroads a large sum of money for its private profit.

Then along come the oil-tank outfits, and it is said, "Of course it would not do for a railroad company to run tank cars, and we must organize inside companies to run tank cars." They again dip into the operating expenses for excess profits, for a great amount of the profits for the big oil companies of the United States.

Then it is said, "We have locomotive shops, but it will not do to rebuild our locomotives in our own shops; we must send them over to the Baldwin company. Baldwin is our friend, because Mr. Morgan, the same man who runs our railroads, runs the Baldwin company." Again they dip into the profits from operating expenses by charging prices two, three, and four hundred per cent above what it would cost to rebuild those locomotives in the railroad-owned shops. The same thing happens in the case of the car shops.

Then comes perhaps the biggest item of all, the coal companies, which are also organized and controlled by the same men who control the railroads. They sell coal to the railroads not at the lowest price for which they can afford to sell it but for the highest price they can collect from the American people under the guaranty provision of the law and under the guaranty provision of the common law that ex-listed before the present transportation act. Alongside of the gigantic profits taken in that way are the profits of the steel companies, which now are controlled by the same men who control the railroads, and again the prices which they charge for steel is not the lowest price at which they can afford to make steel in the United States but the highest price that they can collect from the people of the United States. Those items all added together mean many hundreds of millions of dollars; they mean two or three hundred million dollars every year in the operation of the railroads.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator's premise is wrong. He assumes that the railroad company can do the express work cheaper than can the express company, and, therefore, it could reduce the cost if it would do the same work itself. I do not believe that statement is correct. On the other hand, I believe that separate companies can carry on that business with as much economy and efficiency and at as little cost to the public as could the railroads. I repeat, I think the Senator's premise in that respect is subject to a question.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the old worn-out argument that has been used ever since these inside profiteers organized companies for those purposes. I will cite some instances where it has been done in the other way and draw the comparison. The expense is reduced very greatly where the railroads do the work themselves. There is no need of all these separate organizations with separate overhead.

Mr. FESS. Let me get the Senator's view. The Senator thinks that the Pennsylvania Railroad system can operate the telegraph and operate the express business and operate oil-tank cars and operate the Pullman cars cheaper to the public than can the separate companies which are now conducting those activities. Is that the position of the Senator?

Mr. BROOKHART. They can do it very much cheaper.

Mr. FESS. I should like to have the figures which demonstrate that it can be done cheaper. My conception is that we are getting more efficient and better service at equally cheap rates, if not cheaper, than if it were all done by one company.

Mr. BROOKHART. I know that is the newspaper view of the situation and that is the argument the railroads and the subsidiary companies have always advanced, but when it comes to the proof it is not there. There is no accounting for the gigantic profits they derive except on the theory that they are charging too much for the service.

Mr. FESS. Is there any illegality in the railroads going into these subsidiary businesses and carrying them on themselves?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; but there would be a loss of profit for their big inside men. There were a couple of men from my State who were connected with the New York Central. One of them was president and the other was general purchasing agent. They came back to the State of Iowa millionaires in a very few years. Their profits were enormous out of those activities. That is the way the business is carried on by all the railroads.

There is of course no exact comparison in the United States, because all of our railroads are using these inside grafting companies and it is difficult to get an exact comparison; but I have analyzed the situation in other countries where such activities are conducted by the railroads, and I find a very much reduced cost. The express companies in Germany did not cost half what they did in the United States for the same service before the war.

Mr. FESS. No; because in Germany the cost of operation is cheaper.

The Senator suggested coal. Is it not true that the Reading Railroad, which owns the anthracite fields, was denied under the law the privilege of operating those fields as a railroad? Is not that true?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; that is true, and then it immediately turned around and organized an inside corporation, and the condition was worse than before.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I am enjoying the discussion very much indeed. I regret I did not hear the argument of the able Senator yesterday afternoon, on account of attendance on a committee meeting, but I think we are getting a great many things cleared up. The particular thing in which I am interested, of course, is how to get freight rates reduced to the people in my section of the country. As I now understand, the railroads which have been operating in my State have not been paying dividends for a number of years.

I have in mind especially the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, that serves half of our people. I understand the Northwestern Railroad did pay some dividends out of previous earnings, so that they were really on a dividend-paying basis; but stock of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad was up to about $1.40 before the Government undertook to handle the railroad problem, before we had what is called "McAdoo railroading," before the Federal Government went into the price-fixing business, and saddled upon us the extra burden of $2,000,000,000, a part of which was necessary, no doubt, for some of the railroad employees were underpaid and should have been taken care of in a better way. But the thing that pleases me very much this morning is that we are finding out where the difference comes in between the two forces here, those that say that we can reduce freight rates and those that say that it is difficult, if not impossible, to do so.

The most striking thing to my mind is the fact that the freight rates had to go up to take care of the $2,000,000,000 wage increase. I have never been able to figure out how we could get away from that burden, and we have got to get away from it in whole or in part before freight rates can be reduced on a railroad which does not pay dividends, but which pays out 100 cents for every dollar collected. But I am interested in what the Senator from Iowa says. He has proved, or attempted to prove, that there are certain leaks that should be stopped, and of which the shipper should have the benefits. I am inclined to agree with a great deal the Senator says. The disappointing thing is that he suggests a saving of only two or three hundred million dollars, which is only 10 or 15 per cent of the wage increase that was put upon us. If that is all the relief that is in sight, we are in horrible shape.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator had been here, he would have heard about the other items of relief that I suggested that amount to quite a good deal more.

Mr. NORBECK. May I ask how much more? It is a question of figures here.

Mr. BROOKHART. Over a billion dollars, without reducing wages one cent. I am going to discuss more of those items now.

So far as the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad is concerned, that road goes through my town, too, and it is the watered condition of its capital stock that has cut down its return so that it gets little dividends. A hundred millions or more of water has been injected into that value, which, of course, ought not to get any dividends. A large part of that was done in some western extensions which were coupled up with the old system.

So far as the Burlington Railroad is concerned, it paid 24 per cent and 27 per cent and dividends like that for a number of years. The Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, the Northwestern, and all those roads have been able to earn plenty, and that was on top of watered stock. Why, the Burlington has $100,000,000 of water in its stock, and the commission found in 1910 that it had capitalized $150,000,000 of unearned increment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator answer a question there? We are talking about the profits of railroads, and whether we can reduce the income, thereby reducing freight charges. I can not understand how watered stock has anything whatever to do with the outlay of the railroads; and if you take out the watered stock, how do you reduce the cost of operation?

Mr. BROOKHART. The law provides that the railroads shall have a return of 5½ per cent now, after adjudication.

Mr. FESS. But they never have had it. They never have gotten it.

Mr. BROOKHART. They got it practically in 1923. They have gotten about all of it; and, referring to this valuation which was fixed at $18,900,000,000, I have already pointed out that there was seven billions of water in that legalized valuation which ought not to be there. That means about $400,000,000 of return that the people must pay in their rates under this law that they ought not to pay.

Mr. FESS. But suppose you take that out.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have taken that out in one point of my argument.

Mr. FESS. Suppose you take that out: Then how do you enable the railroads to reduce the rates when you have not changed the cost of operation?

Mr. BROOKHART. If they do not need to earn dividends on that $7,000,000,000 they can reduce the rates by that much.

Mr. FESS. However, they have these fixed prices to pay; and if you reduce the income by that amount, then how are you going to reduce the freight charges when you are not reducing the outgo? You are leaving the outgo the same as it was.

Mr. BROOKHART. The fact that they have fixed prices makes no difference.

Mr. FESS. That only reduces the income. That does not reduce the outgo.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under the law they are entitled to charge rates sufficient to give them a return of 5½ per cent.

Mr. FESS. But the Senator is talking only about the income. I am talking about the outgo.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have just talked about two or three hundred million dollars of outgo in the graft of these inside companies. That is one little item that comes squarely out.

Mr. FESS. That is a disputed point.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; it is disputed, but it is there just the same; and that is the reason why we have always had to pay about twice as high freight rates in the United States for the same service as they have had to pay in other countries.

Mr. FESS. Suppose we assume that the Senator's premise is correct in regard to the subsidiaries. How does this watered stock that the Senator talks about have anything to do with the outgo that the railroads are paying?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am afraid it is a hopeless case with the Senator, because he refuses to see that the return collected on this valuation has to be paid by somebody in freight rates. When that has to be done, it amounts to approximately $400,000,000 a year. If we reduce the capitalization so that that will not be collected under the law, it is that much of a saving to the people who pay freight.

Mr. FESS. Let me put it in a different form. Probably then we may able to see it a little more clearly.

The items of cost to a railroad are wages. Are you going to reduce those?—and taxes, $1,000,000 a year. Are you going to reduce those; and if so, how much? Wherein are you going to reduce the items of cost of operation? Which item are you going to reduce? That is what I want to know.

Mr. BROOKHART. All right; I have already told the Senator, in the operating-expense account, how I would reduce these inside profits. That is three or four hundred millions of dollars. Now I am going to tell him about some more of those in the operating-expense account. I had only gotten started on that phase of the proposition.

At the present time overmaintenance is constantly charged by these railroads. They are building up the roads, making them better every year, out of the operating-expense account.

Mr. FESS. There is a point where there might be a reduction.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have proved that before the commission in the rate cases, and I know it is true. It was claimed that they were not properly maintained during Government operation, but the fact is that they were overmaintained then; and the final report of the director general admits that, although he is entirely favorable to the railroad side of these questions. There is another item that is going to reduce these expenses.

If we can have these enforced consolidations by condemnation of stocks and bonds, and end competition, we will end a very great waste and a very great expense. The waste of competition is one of the burdens of our railroad system. Away back in the days of Collis P. Huntington he said that the waste of competition in New York City alone was $100,000,000 a year. If it was $100,000,000 a year in his time, it is $200,000,000 a year now. Ten years ago Edward Dudley Kenna, vice president of the Santa Fe Railroad, one of the great authorities upon these questions, wrote a book analyzing this waste of competition, and he said 10 years ago it exceeded $400,000,000 a year. If it was $400,000,000 10 years ago, it is five or six hundred million dollars a year now, with the advance of wages and the advance of prices and the advance of everything of that kind. So the proposition I have made will cut out these gigantic items in operating expense; it will cut out these gigantic items in the capital account and reduce the amount that will have to be earned in order to pay dividends, and upon all of those items more than a billion dollars' reduction in rates can be made, again I say without reducing the wages of any man that works.

Mr. BRUCE obtained the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. BRUCE. Is the Senator going to offer an amendment?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am going to suggest something in that connection.

Mr. BRUCE. I think that I prefer to go on just now. I have not been taken into the confidence of the Senator at all with regard to his plans, and so I think that I shall proceed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was about to do this for the benefit of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not ask the Senator to yield any more. I was going to do something for the Senator's benefit, but since he does not understand it I will not.

Mr. BRUCE. I think I do understand it.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator does understand it, it is surprising.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, indeed? I at least did not understand the full extent to which—I hardly know what expression to use—to which the haste of the Senator from Nevada is capable of going.

Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Nevada upon the strategic cleverness that he has exhibited in this matter. As a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee he said or did nothing to indicate that he felt any particular degree of interest in departures from the fourth section of the interstate commerce act so far as they affected the lower reaches of the Mississippi. What he was really interested in, and what most of the supporters of the amendment that he is about to offer are interested in, is departures from the fourth section of the act in the intermountain country. Like a good general, he has been making a feint attack on departures on the lower Mississippi when what he was truly concerned about was the proposed departures—for there are no actual departures at the present time—in the intermountain region.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the Senator will object to yielding when he is discussing what I said or did not say in committee. I will ask the Senator if he will yield to me.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for any purpose except the one that he was harboring just now.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was not going to offer any amendment. I was going to suggest that possibly the amendment might be offered so that it would be open to discussion, but that is past.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator is a strategist, and in my blundering way I tried to be one just a little, too.

Mr. PITTMAN. I simply wish to say that I did not testify before the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I do not remember what argument I made in the committee in support of the bill. I will admit to the Senator, however, that he is correct in his assumption that my State is more interested in the long and short haul legislation, so-called, by reason of the discriminations that are practiced under it against our State as against coast points than it is in the subject that I was discussing, namely, the effect of this legislation upon water transportation. I will admit that.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator is bound to admit that, with great respect to him.

Mr. PITTMAN. And I called attention to the fact when I started to speak that I was taking that branch of the subject because the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] was taking the other branch of it. I would just as soon have taken the other. I dislike very much, however, to have the Senator think, because I come from a State that has a direct interest in the legislation by reason of one phase of it, that I can not as a Senator of the United States have any interest in inland waterways or the Panama Canal.

As a matter of fact, our people out there were intensely interested in the building of the Panama Canal. They thought it was going to be of benefit to the whole country, and particularly to the West. It has resulted as a disadvantage to the intermountain country; but nevertheless, if the Senator please. I do not want him to think that I am so selfish and so narrow that it is impossible for me to look at anything from a national standpoint.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not think that. The Senator has too many of the elements of true statesmanship in him, if he will allow me to say so, to take such an attitude as that toward any public question; and even with reference to this particular question the Senator is not speaking only for the State of Nevada. He is speaking for one of the most important regions in the United States—that is to say, the intermountain region. I gladly acquit the Senator of any disposition whatever to take too pinched or circumscribed a view of the question under consideration; and it may be, for all I know, that, since the Senator was born down on the lower Mississippi, he may have been drawn back to that part of the United States by sentimental as well as practical considerations.

Be that as it may, I think that more importance has been attached to departures along the lower Mississippi River than the occasion really calls for. My opinion is that the Senator from Nevada has failed to take into due account the handicaps to which navigation on the Mississippi and its tributaries is subject when brought into competition with rail transportation.

There was a time, of course, when the bosom of the Mississippi and the bosom of the Ohio were alive with water craft; but that, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has pointed out, was a time when there were no railroads running up and down the banks of those western streams.

A railroad may be handicapped to a certain extent when it is in competition with inland water transportation and yet be too much for the water competition. Why is that? The competitive superiority of rail transportation is represented by a differential of no less than 6 per cent. In the first place, railroads can carry and deliver freight with more speed and with more dispatch than steamboats—and speed and dispatch are things for which shippers are always prepared to pay an extraordinary price. In the next place, railroad transportation is much more dependable. As the Senator from Louisiana pointed out, it is only for a brief seasonal period that you can have satisfactory transportation on the Ohio River, and of course navigation on the Mississippi, too, is very much impeded by sand bars and the effects of summer droughts and, in the case of upward voyages, by the force of the current. Railroad transportation, carried on, as it is, on fixed tracks and under perfectly stable and assured conditions, is always a more trustworthy thing than inland water transportation.

The superior trustworthiness of rail service was most strikingly shown during the World War. During that war practically all the coastwise ships that had been transporting freight from the Atlantic seaboard through the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast quit altogether their usual routes for the great profit to be earned from transmarine voyages, and if the people of the Pacific coast had been totally dependent on water transportation they would have had no reliable agency of transportation at all. It was not until after the World War, with its enormous maritime gains, had come to an end that water transportation through the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast of the United States became again what it is at present. So I doubt very much whether any sums that you may expend on the navigation of many of our inland waters will ever produce any permanent results of the same value as those which are secured by railroad transportation.

The discussion in this case, so far as the proposed amendment is concerned, ought to turn, as it turned in the Committee on Interstate Commerce, mainly on transportation conditions in the intermountain region. When we come to that region, the quarrel of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] is really to a great extent a quarrel with God and nature. The Senator from Idaho is complaining because the Deity gave to the State of Idaho the Snake River instead of the Pacific Ocean. San Francisco and Portland and other points on our Pacific seaboard enjoy a decisive advantage over any intermountain city or town in that they are on the Pacific, that vast sheet of water which in all likelihood will become the most important expanse of water in the world, and which is now intimately connected with the Panama Canal, that brings the coastwise commerce of the United States from its eastern to its western coast.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say that my colleague was quarreling with God and nature. As I understood my colleague, what he wants to happen is that God and nature may be permitted to operate without the interference of the Interstate Commerce Commission to thwart their purposes.

Mr. BRUCE. Then, if that were brought about, the intermountain region might be in a worse condition than at present.

Mr. BORAH. If San Francisco and Portland and the other coast cities have their advantage by reason of being upon the ocean, why should they not be satisfied with that advantage, instead of asking for an additional advantage through the railroads charging us more for a short haul than they charge them for a long haul?

Mr. BRUCE. Because if these transcontinental lines were not allowed lower rates to the Pacific seaboard than to intermediate points, then they might have to charge higher rates than now to the intermediate points.

Mr. BORAH. Not necessarily, at all.

Mr. BRUCE. I think so, and that in my judgment is the crux of the whole case. It is true that the low rates to Pacific points which might be granted by the commission might not be fully compensatory in the ordinary sense, but, all the same, they would make a substantial contribution toward the entire overhead expenses of the transcontinental lines, and it is entirely conceivable that if the departures were not allowed on westbound freight rates to Reno, Salt Lake City, Boise City, and other intermountain towns might, instead of being as low as they now are, be still higher.

So, as I have said, the real misfortune of the intermountain country consists in the fact that it is an intermountain country, and, to use the language of Shakespeare, "cribbed, cabined, and confined" by nature. It is not on the sea, and must face the competition of great cities that are.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not want to interrupt the Senator in his discourse, and I do not rise in any spirit except to elicit the Senator's views.

Mr. BORAH. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have not said anything of importance yet; maybe I will not.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator will.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator, of course, will concede that a railroad can not make any money hauling freight at less than the cost of hauling, and with a little profit added.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course not; there must be the out-of-pocket-plus rate for the railroad to make any profit.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If the railroad hauls, then, to any destination, should it not, as an economic proposition, always charge a rate which will pay the expense of the haul and a small profit to that point; and if it pursues any other policy, does it not necessarily involve a loss?

Mr. BRUCE. That is perfectly true; but these transcontinental lines which are asking for departures in the present case propose, if the Interstate Commerce Commission will allow them to do so, to charge out-of-pocket-plus rates. That is to say, they do not propose to charge fully compensatory rates—under the statute they are not bound to do that—but they do propose to charge reasonably compensatory rates; that is to say, rates which, notwithstanding the fact that they are lower than the rates that they charge to intermediate points, will yet make a material contribution toward their general expenses.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then they must be making a profit.

Mr. BRUCE. They will make a profit, though a comparatively small profit, and it is to the interest of points in the intermountain country that they should be allowed to make it, because if they were not given permission to do so they might either have to go out of business altogether or charge higher rates to intermediate points.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If the Senator will pardon just a further interruption, I am trying to get his view——

Mr. BRUCE. That is my view.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If a railroad hauls freight from New York to San Francisco and makes a reasonable profit, how can it be justified in making a system of rates such that it can better afford to haul freight from New York through Denver to San Francisco, and then back to Denver, and charge a lower rate for that haul than it would charge as a direct rate to Denver?

Mr. BRUCE. It has to meet water competition at San Francisco or Portland, and it has to adjust its rates so as to be able to meet it, and to share in some of the business which the water lines would otherwise monopolize.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But why does it not unload that Denver freight at Denver when it goes west from New York and not ship it on to the coast and then ship it back something like 1,400 miles to Denver, making a perfectly useless haul of about 2,800 miles?

Mr. BRUCE. I have heard no testimony to the effect that that is ever done.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Those are the facts, and those conditions have existed for many years in various forms. I am trying to see how that can be reconciled, as an economic proposition, with the reduction of overhead charges by making a low rate to the coast.

Mr. BRUCE. Those are not the facts which have been brought to my attention. The roads are simply asking for a differential on the Pacific coast that will enable them to participate to a reasonable extent in commerce that is now water borne.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Corroborating what the Senator from Missouri has stated, may I say to the Senator that a practice which prevailed many years in my State, and in all of the intermountain region, was just as destructive as that to which the Senator has referred. Indeed, that is an exemplification of it. Frequently goods and commodities which would be purchased in Chicago and in New York for Salt Lake City, Utah, and Boise and surrounding territories would pass on to California, usually to San Francisco, sometimes to Sacramento, and then be shipped back again to the interior point. They would not permit us to unload them at Ogden or Salt Lake City, or, if we did, we would have to pay the rate to the coast plus the rate back again. That even does not exist to-day, but we fear that if the petitions now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be granted, we will be confronted with the same evil practices which in the past have been so ruinous to our intermountain section.

Mr. BRUCE. I was coming to that aspect of the case. The discussion has gone on exactly as if there were now departures from the fourth section of the interstate commerce act actually applying to west-bound freight on its way to the Pacific coast. That is not the case. What is being indulged by Members of the Senate who have participated in this discussion so far is a mere apprehension, based solely on the fact that the transcontinental lines have made application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for departures on some 43 west-bound commodities. Nobody knows whether the Interstate Commerce Commission will allow those departures or not. It is clothed with full discretion to say whether it will do so or not. What right therefore has any Member of the Senate to anticipate, in the manner that is now being pursued, the action of the commission on these applications?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I would like to understand the Senator, if he will pardon me.

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I want to be sure that I understand him. Am I to understand the Senator to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission has not allowed such rates to the Pacific coast and that the condition to which I have referred does not, in principle, exist?

Mr. BRUCE. It does not exist in fact at all, if the testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee can be believed.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well; I understand the Senator now.

Mr. BRUCE. In the first place, there are no departures at all, actual or agitated, on eastbound freight from the Pacific coast. That is the testimony, and the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee will bear me out when I say that. Nor, as I have said, are there just at this time, though there were before the World War, any departures in force on westbound freight to the Pacific coast.

So I say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] and to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] that they are crying out before they are hurt. What right have they to prejudge the conclusion of the Interstate Commerce Commission? What right have they to suppose that it will not exercise soundly and wisely its discretion? And yet, notwithstanding the fact that the anticipated departures are all in fieri, even the conservative Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has gone so far as to say that he is very often inclined to think that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be abolished and that for one—I think that I quote his exact words—he is fully and completely disgusted with it. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] has not fallen short of saying that the commission is a mere tool of the railroads. Think of that! This commission, the duties of which have been administered by such able and upright men as Judge Cooley and Mr. Prouty, a mere tool of the railroads!

The Senator actually went so far in his outburst of extravagant hysteria as to quote the famous letter of Lord Macaulay, in which he predicted the certain downfall of our democratic institutions.

So first of all I ask the Senate to keep in mind the fact that not one single hair upon the head of the intermountain territory has been affected by a departure yet, and that there is not a Member of this body who has any right to arrogate to himself the office of prophecy and to say that the commission will grant a single one of the departures that are now petitioned for.

Here I propose to digress for a moment for the purpose of making just a brief excursion into the wider domain of discussion into which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] at certain points in their respective addresses allowed themselves to be deflected. I confess that I am beginning to weary of the statement that is made almost every day of the week in this body that the farmer is fairly being ground into the earth by excessive freight rates. During the debates on the transportation act of 1920 it was again and again stated that the people of the United States enjoyed the lowest freight and passenger rates in the whole world, notwithstanding the fact that they paid their employees the highest wages in the whole world, and paid for all the materials and supplies that they purchased the highest prices in the world.

Relatively, railroad rates are lower in the United States to-day than they were before the World War. I defy any Member of the Senate or any other legislative body to establish the contrary. The average increase in railroad rates in the United States has been only 54.63 per cent since 1914, as against an average increase in the cost of living, which has been recently computed by one of the Government bureaus to amount to 68 per cent at this time.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean the conclusion of the World War or the beginning of it in August, 1914?

Mr. BRUCE. I am speaking of the eve of the war, of 1914. It so happens, as the chairman of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee knows, that we have recently had a great deal of highly instructive testimony upon this point. Among the witnesses was Mr. Daniel Willard, the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. What did he say before the committee? He said:

> The price which the railroads—or, at least, some of them—were obliged to pay for their fuel in 1923 was 116 per cent higher than in 1916. The prices paid for lumber, ties, steel, including rails and other representative material, were about 57 per cent higher in 1923 than the average prices during the three years, July 1, 1914, to June 30, 1917, known as the test period. Taxes paid by the railroads in 1923 were 145 per cent higher than in 1914, equal to an increase of $196,485,000. The official figures of the United States Department of Labor show that the total cost of living in 1923 was 68 per cent higher than in 1914, as indicated on the chart submitted herewith—that is, the chart attached to this statement. These figures, which have been carefully obtained from the most reliable sources, fully support the statement that railroad rates to-day are comparatively lower than in 1914, because the per cent of increase in railroad charges over 1914 is substantially less than the average aggregate per cent of increase in connection with the other items above mentioned.

These figures can not be gainsaid. They emanate from an absolutely trustworthy source, and are subject to verification by anybody. On the same occasion Mr. Willard said that the average increase of railroad rates since 1914 in the United States had been only 54.63 per cent, though the increase in the wages of railroad employees during the same time had been 98 per cent.

And what else did Mr. Willard say? I ask the attention of every Member of the Senate within the sound of my voice to it. He testified that the entire net revenue of the railroads of the United States from the transportation of agricultural products in 1923 was $132,000,000. Then he demonstrated by a simple arithmetical calculation, which any Member of this body, nay, any schoolboy, can make for himself, that if this whole sum of $132,000,000 was applied to the wheat and corn raised by the farmers of the United States in 1923, it would signify an increase of only 4 cents per bushel. Yet we have a Member of the Senate like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] threatening us practically with the destruction of our American institutions if these frightful rate abuses, that exist in his own imagination only, are not redressed.

No; what has been said here is but another illustration of the unreasoning agrarian agitation that is going on in the Northwest, and of that agitation I have no disposition to speak at any length. It is to a great extent as preceding agitations of the kind have been, merely the restless edges of the sea murmuring because they can not escape the constraint of the rock-bound land. But, to use a vigorous phrase, it does fatigue my indignation to hear it said that the railroads of the country are ruthlessly oppressing the farmer and placing an intolerable burden upon his back, and to see our superb railroad system, the finest in the world, threatened with derangement and even destruction by every covert or open attack that could possibly be made upon their welfare and that of the people of the United States to whom their welfare is a matter of such vital concern.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. I wish to inquire of the Senator——

Mr. BRUCE. In just one moment I will gladly yield to the Senator. I desire to continue a little longer while I am on my present topic.

Mr. KING. My inquiry is apropos of what the Senator is saying.

Mr. BRUCE. But I desire to go on before the line of thought that I am now pursuing passes from my mind.

Another gentleman with an arithmetical turn of mind has calculated just what effect freight rates at the present time have on the cost of living; and he has made up the following little table:

Freight rates have little, if any, effect on the cost of living

Freight charges on the following commodities and the prices paid by the ultimate consumer are as shown:

Commodity	Freight rate	Consumer pays	Per cent of freight rate to cost to consumer
Flour, 1 pound, Minneapolis to Cedar Rapids, Iowa	1.9 mills	$0.06	3.17
Suit, 6 pounds, Chicago to Seattle (about)	7 cents	50.00	.14
Hat, ½ pound, Chicago to Cedar Rapids	7.9 mills	4.00	.20
Sugar, 1 pound, New Orleans to Chicago	7 mills	.10	7.00
Coffee, 1 pound, New Orleans to Chicago	6.5 mills	.45	1.44
Tea, 1 pound, Seattle to Chicago	1.5 cents	1.00	1.50
Salt, 1 pound, Detroit to Cedar Rapids	2.5 mills	.02	12.50
Butter, 1 pound, Cedar Rapids to Chicago	4.75 mills	.65	.73
Eggs, 2 pounds (1 dozen), Cedar Rapids to Chicago	9.5 mills	.56	1.70

Now, let me pass from that to freight rates on livestock in the West at the present time, as set forth in a recent publication.

Sales of livestock and the freight rates paid on the same were studied at four markets: Chicago, East St. Louis, Kansas City, and South Omaha. These studies were made for three days at intervals of three weeks, October 15, November 5, and November 26, 1923. The stock was received from 27 States and included 13,161 cattle, 18,585 hogs, and 24,682 sheep. Then, taking each class of stock separately, the cost to the purchaser, delivered at the yards, was divided into three items—price paid to the farmer, freight paid to the railroad, and miscellaneous distribution costs. The following is the result:

With cattle, freight was 6.9 per cent of the total bill; miscellaneous costs, 3.1 per cent; price to the farmer, 90 per cent.

With hogs, freight came to 5.1 per cent; miscellaneous costs to 3.3 per cent; price paid to the farmer, 91.6 per cent.

With sheep, freight covered 7.4 per cent; miscellaneous costs, 4.1 per cent; price paid to the farmer, 88.5 per cent.

Or, taking all stock together, of every dollar paid out by the buyer the railroads got 6.5 per cent for freight, other costs absorbed 3.3 cents, and the farmer got 90.2 cents.

In view of all the unimpeachable figures, founded on the actual records of the transportation systems of this country that I have given, I assert again that freight rates in the United States to-day are relatively lower than they were in 1914. Surely it is not the fault of the railroads that wages have gone up 98 per cent since 1914; surely it is not their fault that the cost of everything in the way of materials and supplies which they buy has gone up greatly, too. How can we expect railroad rates to remain down when nothing else remains down?

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BRUCE. I will be glad if the Senator will postpone the interruption for a moment. I have a great deal of matter to get through with. However, if he desires to ask me a question along the line that I am pursuing, I will yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. I merely wish to say that I am sure the Senator would not want to misrepresent the facts in any way. He refers to the record which he has cited as being unimpeachable, but it is a fact that the freight rates on livestock from western points to market are relatively higher in proportion to what the livestock is selling for in the market than they were in 1914.

Mr. BRUCE. I will let the figures speak for themselves. Of course, after all, it is not true that figures do not lie, but I think that they have about the best deserved reputation for veracity of anything in the world.

Mr. KENDRICK. Figures do not lie, but liars do figure.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; they certainly do sometimes, especially when they are strongly under the influence of agrarian agitation and disaffection.

If I thought that there was any practical way of aiding the farmer along such lines as have been suggested in this body since I became one of its Members, I would certainly lend a helping hand. I am the son of a farmer, of a man who never pursued any occupation during the nearly 50 years of his active business life but that of a farmer, and I myself owned a farm for many years, and have had not a limited experience in farming. Whenever the hand of Congress can be held out wisely to the farmer, I wish to see it held out, because his industry is the basic industry upon which the whole structure of our national prosperity is founded.

I think that a great deal can be done for his benefit along cooperative lines. A few years ago a cooperative marketing tobacco association was established in North Carolina and southern Virginia, which proved highly beneficial to the tobacco planter, and I hope that it is proving so to-day, too.

The real trouble with the farmer is that he happens to be the first individual in the body politic to whom the inevitable processes of deflation that set up after the World War were applied. Sooner or later we shall all be subjected to the same trying process. Under the operation of the crushing tariff enacted by the Republican Party a short time ago the farmer is paying exorbitant prices for almost everything that he buys, and under the operation of what I conceive to be the fatuous international policy of the Republican Party he has no good foreign market in which to sell. So much for the more general considerations which have been lugged into this debate.

Now, as the French say, let us get back to our mutton; that is to say, to the long-and-short-haul clause of the interstate commerce act. I began by saying that the attention of the people of the intermountain section has been so closely riveted upon their own region that in their apprehension lest departures might be fastened upon them under the fourth section of the act, they have quite ignored the fact that in all the other regions of the United States business and commerce are largely built up upon rate structures involving thousands and thousands of such departures. And so little injustice have these departures worked in the central and eastern portions of the United States, that not one solitary human being from them, I believe, appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee to lift up his voice in favor of the Gooding bill.

It is a great mistake to think that the discretion vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission by the fourth section of the interstate commerce act is exercised only where railroads come into competition with water transportation lines. It is exercised in many cases that have no relation to competition between rail and water transportation.

Let us take just a few typical examples, and I hope that Members of the Senate will apply them to their own local or regional conditions as I go along.

First of all, there may be a direct railroad line between two points, and there may be a circuitous railroad line between the same two points. In cases of that sort the Interstate Commerce Commission in many instances has allowed the circuitous line to fix a lower rate at a common point at which it comes into competition with the direct line than at intermediate points on its own line. The communities served by the two railroads profit by such action on the part of the commission. They have two vehicles of transportation instead of one. They have two railroads engaged in active competition with each other, instead of a single railroad endued with an oppressive monopoly. In times of congestion and car shortage, too, there are two railroads to tap the congestion instead of one.

The Gooding bill, I am glad to say, at least does not entirely destroy the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant departures in cases like these, though it does deprive partly rail and partly water lines and pipe lines and sleeping-car lines of the privilege of departure. A good illustration of a direct line and a circuitous line between the same competitive points is found in the Illinois Central, which is a direct line between Charles City, Iowa, and Omaha, and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific and Charles City Western Railways, which is a circuitous line between the same points. The direct line is 275 miles long; the circuitous 318; but the people of the region in which the two railroads are operated are served by both, as they should be, under orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission allowing the proper departures from the fourth section of the interstate commerce act.

Again, the Interstate Commerce Commission at times allows departures for the purpose of strengthening some weak railroad, that without any fault of its own is in a poor financial condition, and experiences difficulty in meeting its operating expenses. There are many roads of this kind in the United States, and yet not a few of them are of indispensable value to the communities that they serve. An illustration of this situation is found in the Tennessee Central road, which runs from Emory Gap, Tenn., through Nashville, Tenn., where it meets the competition of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, one of the strongest railroads in the United States, to Hopkinsville, Ky. It traverses a mountainous, sparsely-settled region, and it would have to go out of existence if the Interstate Commerce Commission did not allow it to charge lower rates at Nashville than at intermediate points between Emory Gap and Nashville.

Again, the power of allowing departures is sometimes exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of equalizing the positions of two ports. For example, there have always been large importations of green coffee into the United States through the port of New Orleans, and there was a strong tendency on the part of this commodity to find its way into the United States through the port of Galveston too, to the same points served by New Orleans. Consequently to enable the railway lines running out of Galveston to deliver green coffee at these points, which were remoter from Galveston than New Orleans, the latter lines were authorized by the commission to charge lower rates to them than to intermediate points; and in the same way the commission has conferred reciprocal privileges upon the port of New Orleans.

Again the commission often allows departures so that the productions from a particular territory or region in the United States can be transported to a common market by more than one railroad line, one railroad line, of course, being more remote from the common market than the other. The result is achieved by allowing the railroad that is the more remote one from the common market to charge lower freight rates at the point of destination than at intermediate points on its line. An example of this sort of departure is found in the special rates that railroads were allowed to make a few years ago on western sugar to meet the competition of foreign sugar coming in through the ports of New York and New Orleans. Again, departures are sometimes permitted to aid situations created by drought or famine. Such a situation arose in 1922 during the terrible drought of that year in the State of New Mexico. The commission allowed railway lines leading into that State to deviate from the hard-and-fast rule of the fourth section both for the purpose of delivering cattle feed in that State at less cost and of shipping cattle out at less cost. The power to make departures in such a case as this is not revoked by the Gooding bill, but it makes no provision for departures in the case of an emergency created by congestion.

A few years ago the cotton mills in New England were about to shut up because the tracks of railways leading to New England were so densely congested that those mills could not obtain from the South the supply of cotton that they required. This predicament the commission met by allowing the proper departures on railway lines leading down from the cotton region to New Orleans and other South Atlantic ports, where the raw cotton needed by the New England mills was transshipped by water to them.

Still another illustration—I might multiply them still more—is this: A joint-line railroad comes into competition with a single-line railroad. The former is subject to a handicap inasmuch as it has to transship. For the purpose of offsetting this handicap and putting the two lines on a footing of parity, the commission will allow the joint line to depart from the strict rule of the fourth section of the act.

Is the beneficent jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission in all those varied cases, and others that might be enumerated, to be swept out of existence? The Senate should bear in mind that the power to grant departures from the rule prescribed by the long-and-short-haul prohibition has existed ever since February 4, 1887; that is to say, about 37 years. It is true that from time to time the fourth section has been amended, but never has Congress been willing to repeal it. In the first instance, the railroads were allowed to haul freight for longer distances at lower rates than for shorter distances under what the act termed "substantially similar circumstances and conditions." It was found that the discretion that this language gave to the railroads was at times abused, and it was taken away from them by Congress in 1910 and lodged in the commission.

The act of 1910 provided that in special cases a railway might be empowered by the commission to haul freight and passengers for a longer distance at a lower rate than for a shorter distance over the same line and in the same direction. The same act provided also that where a departure from the fourth section was allowed in order that a railroad might meet water competition, the railroad should not afterwards be permitted to raise the reduced rate simply on the strength of the actual elimination of the water competition.

Then later was enacted the act of 1920, which provided that where a rate was allowed to be charged at a point of destination lower than at intermediate points it should be a "reasonably compensatory" one, and that a departure would not be granted to a railroad to meet merely potential water competition. Some other amendments also, which I need not mention in detail, were engrafted upon the interstate commerce act by the act.

Be it remembered that during this entire period of 37 years the power conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by the original interstate commerce act as modified by these amendments has been exercised, and exercised in thousands and thousands of instances, and so wisely exercised that, aside from the intermountain country, and the territory along the lower stretches of the Mississippi, there is no dissatisfaction, so far as I know, harbored at the present time by shippers in any portion of the United States because of rate departures.

Since 1910 there have been some 12,000 applications for departures made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and among those applications is a vast number of blanket applications, each one of which comprehends many applications. Rate structures throughout the United States have been built up largely on such departures.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] knows to what extent the business of New England is founded at the present time upon rail and water differentials.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr STANFIELD in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I have not been able to listen to all of the Senator's remarks on this subject. I did listen, as I had an opportunity, to the speeches made in favor of this amendment, and I will say to the Senator from Maryland that they sounded well, but it is not always well to legislate by sound.

I remember that in 1883 and 1884 we had this long-and-short-haul question up for the first time in Connecticut, when I was a member of the Connecticut General Assembly.

It was the important question before that body, and in the enthusiasm of my youth I was easily convinced that the argument which was so attractive to the ear was sound in fact, and we passed the bill. It did not work as we expected. It simply gave the direct line a little additional income, and reduced the income of the circuitous line, which ran through the town in which I happened to live, and if the circuitous line had been permitted to charge rates that would have paid expenses, they would have been compelled to raise the rate instead of lowering it. I can see no other conclusion. Frankly, if this bill is passed, I can not see how anyone living in the State of Idaho can expect to see any reduction in freight rates.

Mr. BRUCE. There would probably be an increase, I should say.

Mr. McLEAN. That seems to me to be a mathematical certainty, because if a transcontinental road, by the operation of this law, is prevented from taking freight to the coast, which it could otherwise take at a compensatory rate, if there is a loss of $100 in its net income, that loss must be made up by adding to the rates to the intermediate points.

Mr. BRUCE. I think that that is unquestionably sound reasoning. Indeed, before the Senator came into the Senate Chamber I endeavored to present that aspect of the pending question.

Mr. McLEAN. We have tried it in the East, and we have learned our lesson, and if the West insists upon the experiment, they will learn the lesson, too.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. We are not expecting any reduction in freight rates through this legislation if it is enacted. What we are expecting is that San Francisco, Seattle, Portland, and all other coast points shall not have a cheaper rate than the people of Idaho have, when the haul is a thousand miles longer. This bill interferes with no circuitous lines at all in this country, and permits the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a violation if they want to. That is a special exception that is made. We only ask that our farming interests and other people may go on and develop the interior of our country. We have especially provided that other people shall not be interfered with. If the Senator would read my amendment, I think he would take our view of it.

Mr. McLEAN. The inevitable logic of the Senator's argument is that if the road is deprived of its through traffic, and thereby loses on its net income, it will have to raise the rate to the intermediate points in order to live.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, we can pass legislation that will permit the interior of this country to develop. It has not commenced to develop yet. It is not scratched. The Senator knows that you can not develop a country where there is discrimination in freight rates. He knows what would happen to the business of his town if there were a discrimination of even a few cents against it. That is what we are opposing.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not want to take the time of the Senator from Maryland, but if the Congress is going to undertake to remedy the geographical disadvantage of one community by operation of law, the Senator from Idaho will find that his location will be the first to suffer injury. If there were 20,000,000 people living in San Francisco instead of a million, does the Senator think it would hurt the industries of Idaho? Does he think the building up of the great seaboard cities means injury to the intermountain section?

Mr. GOODING. I will say to the Senator that when they are built up at the expense of the interior, it is an injury.

Mr. McLEAN. You can not build them up at the expense of other sections.

Mr. GOODING. That is exactly what the discrimination in freight rates does.

Mr. McLEAN. It is an economic impossibility.

Mr. GOODING. That is all the Senator is after, a discrimination in freight rates in the interest of his own people, so that they may take the business away from the people of the interior.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, as we lawyers say, this debate is becoming too much res inter alios acta, as far as I am concerned, for me not to crave my privilege of going on to say what I still have to say.

Answering the Senator from Idaho, I affirm that the Pacific Ocean ports will always have lower rates than the intermountain country so long as the Pacific Ocean laps their wharves and piers, as he was told by the counsel of the railways who appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee when his bill was under consideration. That is the controlling, inescapable fact in this whole discussion. These Pacific ports are seated upon the Pacific Ocean and are readily accessible to the water-borne commerce of both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, and consequently the intermountain region can never, under any conditions, occupy as favorable a position as respect rates as do the Pacific port cities.

Mr. McLEAN. The prosperity from this great increase in population at the seaboard must reflect itself, of course, upon the intermediate sections of the country.

Mr. BRUCE. Precisely; it radiates out through all of the intermountain country.

I ask every man on this floor who is directly interested in the welfare of any port on the Atlantic seaboard, or of any railroad in the East, to inquire how the Gooding bill will affect his community and his constituents. Let the Senators from Massachusetts ask how it will affect the commerce of the city of Boston. Let the Senators from New York ask how it will affect the commerce of the city of New York. Let the same question be asked by the representatives of the State of Maryland, of the State of Virginia, of the State of South Carolina, of the State of Georgia, of the State of Louisiana, of the State of Texas, all of which States have important maritime cities whose prosperity is largely based on departures granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of putting them on an equal competitive footing with Atlantic ports farther north. Extending all the way from New England to the southern and southeastern and central parts of the United States are two great agencies of transportation.

First you have all-water lines, or partly rail and partly water lines; and then, making across the United States to the westward, you have great all-rail lines, and it would not be possible to balance these rail and water or partly rail and partly water systems of transportation in such a way as fully to subserve the transportation needs of the people if departures were not allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Just take, for instance, one line of trade in which the State of New York and the State of Maryland are engaged to a very great extent. I am speaking of shipments of canned goods. The State of New York and the State of Maryland ship great quantities of canned goods by sea to southern ports, and from these ports they find their way to points in the interior, to Oklahoma, to Missouri, and to other localities, to which they could never find their way if there were no such thing as departures to equalize the competition between the agencies by which they are transported and the shorter all-rail agencies by which the same points of destination are reached from the interior of the country.

I say another thing to some of the Senators here: That is that if the fourth section of the interstate commerce act is mutilated, as is proposed by the Gooding bill, we have the testimony of no less an authority than the Interstate Commerce Commission itself to the effect that some of the roads in the States which they represent will go into bankruptcy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me the logical effect of the Senator's address is that water transportation must be practically eliminated in order to save the railroads.

Mr. BRUCE. Not at all. My idea is the idea of the transportation act itself—that is, that the rail and water transportation systems of the United States should both be fostered and preserved.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator is not willing that the railroads shall come in competition with water transportation.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; I am. That is just what I would like to see, if the Interstate Commerce Commission thinks that it is wise in this instance.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but the best regulator of rates, in my judgment, in the world is water transportation. I think water transportation regulates rates without any favoritism, and it is constantly in operation. It seems to me that it is one of the most certain regulators of rates that we could have.

Mr. BRUCE. It is, but at the same time nothing can be more completely established than the fact that if you have a railroad competing with a steamship line at a certain point of destination the railroad can, if allowed the proper departure, charge just a little more than the water line and yet maintain the competition with a reasonable degree of success. This is because transportation by rail is so much more speedy, so much more certain, and under many circumstances so much more dependable than transportation by water.

Mr. BORAH. The railroads, of course, can take care of themselves against water competition, so we need not be uneasy about cutting into the competition.

Mr. BRUCE. I am not uneasy. All they want to do is come in competition with the water lines at San Francisco and Portland. What they ask is that the rates to those points be placed at levels that will enable them to get a fair share of the traffic at those points.

Mr. BORAH. And the extra charge for it is placed back upon the intermountain points.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not think so. My own view about it is, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] seems to agree with me entirely on that subject, that it might be that if we do not allow the transcontinental lines to transport freight to the Pacific coast at rates lower than to intermediate points they might have to put up the rates to intermediate points.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Idaho assumes they can continue to get the traffic if they raise the rate, whereas that is impossible if the water rate is lower.

Mr. BRUCE. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. I do not assume that. The one thing I am objecting to is the high rate, and I want the power of water transportation to bring down those rates.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator takes the other horn of the dilemma, they lose the traffic.

Mr. BORAH. I am not uneasy about that. That horn of the dilemma is not disturbing me. The western part of the United States is practically foreign country so far as shipments to the East now are concerned. The freight rates are such that we are practically cut off from the East. Of course, if it is true that the railroads can not exist and earn less money than they are earning, that is one proposition, but a proposition which I do not accept.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, that is a proposition which is accepted by the railroad managers and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BORAH. I know it is accepted by the railroad managers.

Mr. McLEAN. It has been demonstrated that a great many roads have been ruined by reason of the fact that they were not allowed to take freight at a compensatory rate which perhaps did not pay a large dividend.

Mr. BRUCE. I would like to call attention to the fact that the railroads are doing pretty poorly in all of the northwestern territory and all the intermountain territory under existing conditions. They are really having quite a struggle to make anything like a moderate return on the amounts invested on them. For instance, here is the recent testimony by Mr. Elliott, president of the Northern Pacific Railroad, before the Interstate Commerce Committee. Answering the chairman he said:

Now, here is a little bit of information that may interest you, showing what happened on this particular road, which I happen to know about, the Northern Pacific, before there was a transportation act.

In point of fact, he is president, and the very able president, of that road.

We earned in the year 1916 a rate of return of 6.715 per cent; 1917, 5.946. Then the war difficulties began and we ran down hill. In 1918 we earned 4.603; in 1919, 2.720; in 1920, 0.472; in 1921, 1.993; in 1922, 3.537; and in 1923, 2.982. * * * Then, take that northwestern section, which is a great empire—where you live, Senator GOODING. Last year of the carriers serving that country, the Milwaukee made 2.73 per cent; the Great Northern, 4.56 per cent; Minneapolis & St. Louis, 1.22; Soo Line, 3.77; Northern Pacific, 2.93; Oregon, Washington & Navigation Co., 0.61; total, six roads, 3.10; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, 4.24; total, seven roads, 3.33.

So it will be seen these carriers are pretty close to the line of net-revenue sterility now.

Continuing what I was saying, I assert that there are some railroads in the United States which will absolutely have to go out of business if they are not allowed the proper departures. For instance, the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railroad and the Missouri & North Arkansas Railroad. Both of those railroads are valuable roads to the agricultural regions which they serve.

The same things could, perhaps, almost be said of the Georgia, Florida & Alabama Railroad and of the Missouri & North Arkansas.

The truth is that rate departures are so inseparably interwoven with the commerce of the greater part of the country and so much has been erected upon them that the Gooding bill, if enacted, would probably work untold disturbance and derangement, not to say ruin. Shall the rate structures into which these departures enter topple down and be abased to the very dust simply because the citizens of the intermountain territory are afraid that the Interstate Commerce Commission may, on the applications now pending, grant departures on freight bound over the transcontinental lines to the Pacific coast?

Of course, I do not intend to dwell upon the rhapsody in which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] has indulged with reference to the possibilities of the West and its future expansion if departures were only barred. He will have to satisfy me that he is a more accurate observer of contemporary events than I believe him to be before I shall attach much importance to him as a prophet.

I trust that this attempt to maim or hamstring the fourth section of the interstate commerce act will fail, as such efforts have always failed heretofore. Of course, any such provision as the fourth section is bound to breed a certain amount of dissatisfaction. When an act of Congress declares that a railroad may, with the approval of the commission, charge less for a longer than for a shorter distance, and that is done, such a result is almost sure, occasionally, to awaken a sense of fancied injustice on the part of individuals and localities. But on the whole the jurisdiction of the commission in the matter of departures has been justly and judiciously exercised, and is, as a general thing, regarded with popular favor. The commission prescribes certain criteria for itself in exercising the jurisdiction, to which I believe they have honestly adhered. If it is a circuitous route that desires to meet the competition of a direct route, the commission asks whether to grant the departure would involve wasteful transportation or not.

If it is requested to allow a departure on a direct line it takes care to see that when it fixes a lower rate for the longer distance, the rates to intermediate points are not unduly burdensome or unreasonably discriminatory. And that it has the power to fix such lower rates where no excessive burden or undue discrimination is created has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad (234 U. S.) and the case of United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. in the same volume. Even if lower rates to the Pacific coast were fixed by the commission than to Salt Lake City or Reno or other similar interior points, that would be no just subject for complaint in a legal sense provided that the rates to these points were not excessively onerous or unduly discriminatory. A departure does not per se necessarily imply such rates.

Before I conclude, I wish further to call attention to the fact that not only is the power of granting departures exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but also by State public-service commissions when dealing with intrastate rates. That shows that the exercise of the power has not only been a good thing on the whole in the sphere of the National Government, but also in the province of the State governments as well.

A thing that I do not understand is why this bill should be brought up at this late day in the session. It was reported favorably from the committee a good many weeks ago, if my memory serves me right, and it has come up for consideration in the Senate certainly at least once if not oftener, and has gone over for lack of attention, if I am not mistaken. Since it came into the Senate nobody seems to have been paying any heed to it, much less urging the Senate to pass it.

It has been allowed to drift along very much as the shallow, demagogic bill providing for an investigation into railroad propaganda has been allowed to drift. Now, toward the close of the session, when it is impossible for the bill independently of some legislative host or other to be enacted, all of a sudden there is this spasmodic effort made to infuse vitality into it, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] goes to the extraordinary length, as I conceive it, of offering the bill in the form of an amendment to the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I have been reading a good deal recently with respect to different forms of animal life that save themselves the trouble of making their own nests and are in the habit of burrowing into the tails or backs of other forms of animal life and depositing their eggs in the cavities thus created. Last night when I turned to a work on elementary science I could not but be struck with the extraordinary analogy between the effort of the Senator from Nevada to engraft his amendment on the pending bill, to which it is totally foreign in nature, and the habits of a little fish found in the waters of the European Continent which is known as the bitterling. The bitterling is a shrewd economist of time and labor, for, instead of making its own nest out of a little circle of stones or what not, it is in the habit of projecting a long ovipositor downward from its body and depositing its spawn in the shell of the mussel, and allowing the mussel to save it the task of incubation. I think that the Senator from Nevada must have been reading about the curious habits of this creature when he announced to the Senate his intention of finding a host for his amendment of the long-and-short-haul section of the interstate commerce act in a War Department appropriation bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7995) to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7995) to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That this act may be cited as the 'immigration act of 1924.'

"IMMIGRATION VISAS

"SEC. 2. (a) A consular officer upon the application of any immigrant (as defined in section 3) may (under the conditions hereinafter prescribed and subject to the limitations prescribed in this act or regulations made thereunder as to the number of immigration visas which may be issued by such officer) issue to such immigrant an immigration visa which shall consist of one copy of the application provided for in section 7, visaed by such consular officer. Such visa shall specify (1) the nationality of the immigrant; (2) whether he is a quota immigrant (as defined in section 5) or a nonquota immigrant (as defined in section 4); (3) the date on which the validity of the immigration visa shall expire; and (4) such additional information necessary to the proper enforcement of the immigration laws and the naturalization laws as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(b) The immigrant shall furnish two copies of his photograph to the consular officer. One copy shall be permanently attached by the consular officer to the immigration visa and the other copy shall be disposed of as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(c) The validity of an immigration visa shall expire at the end of such period, specified in the immigration visa, not exceeding four months, as shall be by regulations prescribed. In the case of an immigrant arriving in the United States by water, or arriving by water in foreign contiguous territory on a continuous voyage to the United States, if the vessel, before the expiration of the validity of his immigration visa, departed from the last port outside the United States and outside foreign contiguous territory at which the immigrant embarked, and if the immigrant proceeds on a continuous voyage to the United States, then, regardless of the time of his arrival in the United States, the validity of his immigration visa shall not be considered to have expired.

"(d) If an immigrant is required by any law, or regulations or orders made pursuant to law, to secure the visa of his passport by a consular officer before being permitted to enter the United States, such immigrant shall not be required to secure any other visa of his passport than the immigration visa issued under this act, but a record of the number and date of his immigration visa shall be noted on his passport without charge therefor. This subdivision shall not apply to an immigrant who is relieved, under subdivision (b) of section 13, from obtaining an immigration visa.

"(e) The manifest or list of passengers required by the immigration laws shall contain a place for entering thereon the date, place of issuance, and number of the immigration visa of each immigrant. The immigrant shall surrender his immigration visa to the immigration officer at the port of inspection, who shall at the time of inspection indorse on the immigration visa the date, the port of entry, and the name of the vessel, if any, on which the immigrant arrived. The immigration visa shall be transmitted forthwith by the immigration officer in charge at the port of inspection to the Department of Labor under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor.

"(f) No immigration visa shall be issued to an immigrant if it appears to the consular officer, from statements in the application, or in the papers submitted therewith, that the immigrant is inadmissible to the United States under the immigration laws, nor shall such immigration visa be issued if the application fails to comply with the provisions of this act, nor shall such immigration visa be issued if the consular officer knows or has reason to believe that the immigrant is inadmissible to the United States under the immigration laws.

"(g) Nothing in this act shall be construed to entitle an immigrant, to whom an immigration visa has been issued, to enter the United States, if, upon arrival in the United States, he is found to be inadmissible to the United States under the immigration laws. The substance of this subdivision shall be printed conspicuously upon every immigration visa.

"(h) A fee of $9 shall be charged for the issuance of each immigration visa, which shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"DEFINITION OF 'IMMIGRANT'

"SEC. 3. When used in this act the term 'immigrant' means any alien departing from any place outside the United States destined for the United States, except (1) a government official, his family, attendants, servants, and employees, (2) an alien visiting the United States temporarily as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure, (3) an alien in continuous transit through the United States, (4) an alien lawfully admitted to the United States who later goes in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory, (5) a bona fide alien seaman serving as such on a vessel arriving at a port of the United States and seeking to enter temporarily the United States solely in the pursuit of his calling as a seaman, and (6) an alien entitled to enter the United States solely to carry on trade under and in pursuance of the provisions of a present existing treaty of commerce and navigation.

"NONQUOTA IMMIGRANTS

"SEC. 4. When used in this act the term "nonquota immigrant' means—

"(a) An immigrant who is the unmarried child under 18 years of age, or the wife, of a citizen of the United States who resides therein at the time of the filing of a petition under section 9;

"(b) An immigrant previously lawfully admitted to the United States, who is returning from a temporary visit abroad;

"(c) An immigrant who was born in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Mexico, the Republic of Cuba, the Republic of Haiti, the Dominican Republic, the Canal Zone, or an independent country of Central or South America, and his wife, and his unmarried children under 18 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him;

"(d) An immigrant who continuously for at least two years immediately preceding the time of his application for admission to the United States has been, and who seeks to enter the United States solely for the purpose of, carrying on the vocation of minister of any religious denomination, or professor of a college, academy, seminary, or university; and his wife, and his unmarried children under 18 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him; or

"(e) An immigrant who is a bona fide student at least 15 years of age and who seeks to enter the United States solely for the purpose of study at an accredited school, college, academy, seminary, or university, particularly designated by him and approved by the Secretary of Labor, which shall have agreed to report to the Secretary of Labor the termination of attendance of each immigrant student, and if any such institution of learning fails to make such reports promptly the approval shall be withdrawn.

"QUOTA IMMIGRANTS

"SEC. 5. When used in this act the term 'quota immigrant' means any immigrant who is not a nonquota immigrant. An alien who is not particularly specified in this act as a nonquota immigrant or a nonimmigrant shall not be admitted as a nonquota immigrant or a nonimmigrant by reason of relationship to any individual who is so specified or by reason of being excepted from the operation of any other law regulating or forbidding immigration.

"PREFERENCE WITHIN QUOTAS

"SEC. 6. (a) In the issuance of immigration visas to quota immigrants preference shall be given—

"(1) To a quota immigrant who is the unmarried child under 21 years of age, the father, the mother, the husband, or the wife, of a citizen of the United States who is 21 years of age or over; and

"(2) To a quota immigrant who is skilled in agriculture, and his wife, and his dependent children under the age of 16 years, if accompanying or following to join him. The preference provided in this paragraph shall not apply to immigrants of any nationality the annual quota for which is less than 300.

"(b) The preference provided in subdivision (a) shall not in the case of quota immigrants of any nationality exceed 50 per cent of the annual quota for such nationality. Nothing in this section shall be construed to grant to the class of immigrants specified in paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) a priority in preference over the class specified in paragraph (2).

"(c) The preference provided in this section shall, in the case of quota immigrants of any nationality, be given in the calendar month in which the right to preference is established, if the number of immigration visas which may be issued in such month to quota immigrants of such nationality has not already been issued; otherwise in the next calendar month.

"APPLICATION FOR IMMIGRATION VISA

"SEC. 7. (a) Every immigrant applying for an immigration visa shall make application therefor in duplicate in such form as shall be by regulations prescribed.

"(b) In the application the immigrant shall state (1) the immigrant's full and true name; age, sex, and race; the date and place of birth; places of residence for the five years immediately preceding his application; whether married or single, and the names and places of residence of wife or husband and minor children if any; calling or occupation; personal description (including height, complexion, color of hair and eyes, and marks of identification); ability to speak, read, and write; names and addresses of parents, and if neither parent living, then the name and address of his nearest relative in the country from which he comes; port of entry into the United States; final destination, if any, beyond the port of entry; whether he has a ticket through to such final destination; whether going to join a relative or friend, and, if so, what relative or friend and his name and complete address; the purpose for which he is going to the United States; the length of time he intends to remain in the United States; whether or not he intends to abide in the United States permanently; whether ever in prison or almshouse; whether he or either of his parents has ever been in an institution or hospital for the care and treatment of the insane; (2) if he claims to be a nonquota immigrant, the facts on which he bases such claim; and (3) such additional information necessary to the proper enforcement of the immigration laws and the naturalization laws, as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(c) The immigrant shall furnish, if available, to the consular officer, with his application, two copies of his 'dossier' and prison record and military record, two certified copies of his birth certificate, and two copies of all other available public records concerning him kept by the Government to which he owes allegiance. One copy of the documents so furnished shall be permanently attached to each copy of the application and become a part thereof. An immigrant having an unexpired permit issued under the provisions of section 10 shall not be subject to this subdivision. In the case of an application made before September 1, 1924, if it appears to the satisfaction of the consular officer that the immigrant has obtained a visa of his passport before the enactment of this act, and is unable to obtain the documents referred to in this subdivision without undue expense and delay, owing to absence from the country from which such documents should be obtained, the consular officer may relieve such immigrant from the requirements of this subdivision.

"(d) In the application the immigrant shall also state (to such extent as shall be by regulations prescribed) whether or not he is a member of each class of individuals excluded from admission to the United States under the immigration laws, and such classes shall be stated on the blank in such form as shall be by regulations prescribed, and the immigrant shall answer separately as to each class.

"(e) If the immigrant is unable to state that he does not come within any of the excluded classes, but claims to be for any legal reason exempt from exclusion, he shall state fully in the application the grounds for such alleged exemption.

"(f) Each copy of the application shall be signed by the immigrant in the presence of the consular officer and verified by the oath of the immigrant administered by the consular officer. One copy of the application, when visaed by the consular officer, shall become the immigration visa, and the other copy shall be disposed of as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(g) In the case of an immigrant under 18 years of age the application may be made and verified by such individual as shall be by regulations prescribed.

"(h) A fee of $1 shall be charged for the furnishing and verification of each application, which shall include the furnishing and verification of the duplicate, and shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"NONQUOTA IMMIGRATION VISAS

"SEC. 8. A consular officer may, subject to the limitations provided in sections 2 and 9, issue an immigration visa to a nonquota immigrant as such upon satisfactory proof, under regulations prescribed under this act, that the applicant is entitled to be regarded as a nonquota immigrant.

"ISSUANCE OF IMMIGRATION VISAS TO RELATIVES

"SEC. 9. (a) In case of any immigrant claiming in his application for an immigration visa to be a nonquota immigrant by reason of relationship under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 4, or to be entitled to preference by reason of relationship to a citizen of the United States under the provisions of section 6, the consular officer shall not issue such immigration visa or grant such preference until he has been authorized to do so as hereinafter in this section provided.

"(b) Any citizen of the United States claiming that any immigrant is his relative, and that such immigrant is properly admissible to the United States as a nonimmigrant under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 4 or is entitled to preference as a relative under section 6, may file with the Commissioner General a petition in such form as may be by regulations prescribed, stating (1) the petitioner's name and address; (2) if a citizen by birth, the date and place of his birth; (3) if a naturalized citizen, the date and place of his admission to citizenship and the number of his certificate, if any; (4) the name and address of his employer or the address of his place of business or occupation if he is not an employee; (5) the degree of the relationship of the immigrant for whom such petition is made, and the names of all the places where such immigrant has resided prior to and at the time when the petition is filed; (6) that the petitioner is able to and will support the immigrant if necessary to prevent such immigrant from becoming a public charge; and (7) such additional information necessary to the proper enforcement of the immigration laws and the naturalization laws as may be by regulation prescribed.

"(c) The petition shall be made under oath administered by any individual having power to administer oaths, if executed in the United States, but, if executed outside the United States, administered by a consular officer. The petition shall be supported by any documentary evidence required by regulations prescribed under this act. Application may be made in the same petition for admission of more than one individual.

"(d) The petition shall be accompanied by the statements of two or more responsible citizens of the United States, to whom the petitioner has been personally known for at least one year, that to the best of their knowledge and belief the statements made in the petition are true and that the petitioner is a responsible individual able to support the immigrant or immigrants for whose admission application is made. These statements shall be attested in the same way as the petition.

"(e) If the Commissioner General finds the facts stated in the petition to be true, and that the immigrant in respect of whom the petition is made is entitled to be admitted to the United States as a nonquota immigrant under subdivision (a) of section 4 or is entitled to preference as a relative under section 6, he shall, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, inform the Secretary of State of his decision, and the Secretary of State shall then authorize the consular officer with whom the application for the immigration visa has been filed to issue the immigration visa or grant the preference.

"(f) Nothing in this section shall be construed to entitle an immigrant, in respect of whom a petition under this section is granted, to enter the United States as a nonquota immigrant if, upon arrival in the United States, he is found not to be a nonquota immigrant.

"PERMIT TO REENTER UNITED STATES AFTER TEMPORARY ABSENCE

"SEC. 10. (a) Any alien about to depart temporarily from the United States may make application to the Commissioner General for a permit to reenter the United States, stating the length of his intended absence and the reasons therefor. Such application shall be made under oath, and shall be in such form and contain such information as may be by regulations prescribed, and shall be accompanied by two copies of the applicant's photograph.

"(b) If the Commissioner General finds that the alien has been legally admitted to the United States, and that the application is made in good faith, he shall, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, issue the permit, specifying therein the length of time, not exceeding one year, during which it shall be valid. The permit shall be in such form as shall be by regulations prescribed and shall have permanently attached thereto the photograph of the alien to whom issued, together with such other matter as may be deemed necessary for the complete identification of the alien.

"(c) On good cause shown the validity of the permit may be extended for such period or periods, not exceeding six months each, and under such conditions, as shall be by regulations prescribed.

"(d) For the issuance of the permit, and for each extension thereof, there shall be paid a fee of $3, which shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"(e) Upon the return of the alien to the United States the permit shall be surrendered to the immigration officer at the port of inspection.

"(f) A permit issued under this section shall have no effect under the immigration laws, except to show that the alien to whom it is issued is returning from a temporary visit abroad; but nothing in this section shall be construed as making such permit the exclusive means of establishing that the alien is so returning.

"NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS

"SEC. 11. (a) The annual quota of any nationality shall be 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such nationality resident in continental United States as determined by the United States census of 1890, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100.

"(b) The annual quota for any nationality for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1927, and for each fiscal year thereafter, shall be a number which bears the same ratio to 150,000 as the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 having that national origin (ascertained as hereinafter provided in this section) bears to the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100.

(c) For the purpose of subdivision (b) national origin shall be ascertained by determining as nearly as may be, in respect of each geographical area which under section 12 is to be treated as a separate country (except the geographical areas specified in subdivision (c) of section 4) the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 whose origin by birth or ancestry is attributable to such geographical area. Such determination shall not be made by tracing the ancestors or descendants of particular individuals, but shall be based upon statistics of immigration and emigration, together with rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses, and such other data as may be found to be reliable.

"(d) For the purpose of subdivisions (b) and (c) the term 'inhabitants in continental United States in 1920' does not include (1) immigrants from the geographical areas specified in subdivision (c) of section 4 or their descendants, (2) aliens ineligible to citizenship or their descendants, (3) the descendants of slave immigrants, or (4) the descendants of American aborigines.

"(e) The determination provided for in subdivision (c) of this section shall be made by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, jointly. In making such determination such officials may call for information and expert assistance from the Bureau of the Census. Such officials shall, jointly, report to the President the quota of each nationality, determined as provided in subdivision (b), and the President shall proclaim and make known the quotas so reported. Such proclamation shall be made on or before April 1, 1927. If the proclamation is not made on or before such date, quotas proclaimed therein shall not be in effect for any fiscal year beginning before the expiration of 90 days after the date of the proclamation. After the making of a proclamation under this subdivision the quotas proclaimed therein shall continue with the same effect as if specifically stated herein, and shall be final and conclusive for every purpose except (1) in so far as it is made to appear to the satisfaction of such officials and proclaimed by the President, that an error of fact has occurred in such determination or in such proclamation, or (2) in the case provided for in subdivision (c) of section 12. If for any reason quotas proclaimed under this subdivision are not in effect for any fiscal year, quotas for such year shall be determined under subdivision (a) of this section.

"(f) There shall be issued to quota immigrants of any nationality (1) no more immigration visas in any fiscal year than the quota for such nationality, and (2) in any calendar month of any fiscal year no more immigration visas than 10 per cent of the quota for such nationality, except that if such quota is less than 300 the number to be issued in any calendar month shall be prescribed by the commissioner general with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, but the total number to be issued during the fiscal year shall not be in excess of the quota for such nationality.

"(g) Nothing in this act shall prevent the issuance (without increasing the total number of immigration visas which may be issued) of an immigration visa to an immigrant as a quota immigrant even though he is a nonquota immigrant.

"NATIONALITY

"SEC. 12. (a) For the purposes of this act nationality shall be determined by country of birth, treating as separate countries the colonies, dependencies, or self-governing dominions, for which separate enumeration was made in the United States census of 1890; except that (1) the nationality of a child under 21 years of age not born in the United States, accompanied by its alien parent not born in the United States, shall be determined by the country of birth of such parent if such parent is entitled to an immigration visa, and the nationality of a child under 21 years of age not born in the United States, accompanied by both alien parents not born in the United States, shall be determined by the country of birth of the father if the father is entitled to an immigration visa; and (2) if a wife is of a different nationality from her alien husband and the entire number of immigration visas which may be issued to quota immigrants of her nationality for the calendar month has already been issued, her nationality may be determined by the country of birth of her husband if she is accompanying him and he is entitled to an immigration visa, unless the total number of immigration visas which may be issued to quota immigrants of the nationality of the husband for the calendar month has already been issued. An immigrant born in the United States who has lost his United States citizenship shall be considered as having been born in the country of which he is a citizen or subject, or if he is not a citizen or subject of any country, then in the country from which he comes.

"(b) The Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, jointly, shall, as soon as feasible after the enactment of this act, prepare a statement showing the number of individuals of the various nationalities resident in continental United States as determined by the United States census of 1890, which statement shall be the population basis for the purposes of subdivision (a) of section 11. In the case of a country recognized by the United States, but for which a separate enumeration was not made in the census of 1890, the number of individuals born in such country and resident in continental United States in 1890, as estimated by such officials jointly, shall be considered for the purposes of subdivision (a) of section 11 as having been determined by the United States census of 1890. In the case of a colony or dependency existing before 1890, but for which a separate enumeration was not made in the census of 1890 and which was not included in the enumeration for the country to which such colony or dependency belonged, or in the case of territory administered under a protectorate, the number of individuals born in such colony, dependency, or territory, and resident in continental United States in 1890, as estimated by such officials jointly, shall be considered for the purposes of subdivision (a) of section 11 as having been determined by the United States census of 1890 to have been born in the country to which such colony or dependency belonged or which administers such protectorate.

"(c) In case of changes in political boundaries in foreign countries occurring subsequent to 1890 and resulting in the creation of new countries, the governments of which are recognized by the United States, or in the establishment of self-governing dominions, or in the transfer of territory from one country to another, such transfer being recognized by the United States, or in the surrender by one country of territory, the transfer of which to another country has not been recognized by the United States, or in the administration of territories under mandates, (1) such officials, jointly, shall estimate the number of individuals resident in continental United States in 1890 who were born within the area included in such new countries or self-governing dominions or in such territory so transferred or surrendered or administered under a mandate, and revise (for the purposes of subdivision (a) of section 11) the population basis as to each country involved in such change of political boundary, and (2) if such changes in political boundaries occur after the determination provided for in subdivision (c) of section 11 has been proclaimed, such officials, jointly, shall revise such determination, but only so far as necessary to allot the quotas among the countries involved in such change of political boundary. For the purpose of such revision and for the purpose of determining the nationality of an immigrant, (A) aliens born in the area included in any such new country or self-governing dominion shall be considered as having been born in such country or dominion, and aliens born in any territory so transferred shall be considered as having been born in the country to which such territory was transferred, and (B) territory so surrendered or administered under a mandate shall be treated as a separate country. Such treatment of territory administered under a mandate shall not constitute consent by the United States to the proposed mandate where the United States has not consented in a treaty to the administration of the territory by a mandatory power.

"(d) The statements, estimates, and revisions provided in this section shall be made annually, but for any fiscal year for which quotas are in effect as proclaimed under subdivision (e) of section 11 shall be made only (1) for the purpose of determining the nationality of immigrants seeking admission to the United States during such year, or (2) for the purposes of clause (2) of subdivision (c) of this section.

"(e) Such officials shall, jointly, report annually to the President the quota of each nationality under subdivision (a) of section 11, together with the statements, estimates, and revisions provided for in this section. The President shall proclaim and make known the quotas so reported and thereafter such quotas shall continue, with the same effect as if specifically stated herein, for all fiscal years except those for which quotas are in effect as proclaimed under subdivision (e) of section 11, and shall be final and conclusive for every purpose.

"EXCLUSION FROM UNITED STATES

"SEC. 13. (a) No immigrant shall be admitted to the United States unless he (1) has an unexpired immigration visa or was born subsequent to the issuance of the immigration visa of the accompanying parent, (2) is of the nationality specified in the visa in the immigration visa, (3) is a nonquota immigrant if specified in the visa in the immigration visa as such, and (4) is otherwise admissible under the immigration laws.

"(b) In such classes of cases and under such conditions as may be by regulations prescribed immigrants who have been legally admitted to the United States and who depart therefrom temporarily may be admitted to the United States without being required to obtain an immigration visa.

"(c) No alien ineligible to citizenship shall be admitted to the United States unless such alien (1) is admissible as a nonquota immigrant under the provisions of subdivision (b), (d), or (e) of section 4, or (2) is the wife, or the unmarried child under 18 years of age, of an immigrant admissible under such subdivision (d), and is accompanying or following to join him, or (3) is not an immigrant as defined in section 3.

"(d) The Secretary of Labor may admit to the United States any otherwise admissible immigrant not admissible under clause (2) or (3) of subdivision (a) of this section, if satisfied that such inadmissibility was not known to, and could not have been ascertained by the exercise of reasonable diligence by, such immigrant prior to the departure of the vessel from the last port outside the United States and outside foreign contiguous territory, or, in the case of an immigrant coming from foreign contiguous territory, prior to the application of the immigrant for admission.

"(e) No quota immigrant shall be admitted under subdivision (d) if the entire number of immigration visas which may be issued to quota immigrants of the same nationality for the fiscal year has already been issued. If such entire number of immigration visas has not been issued, then the Secretary of State, upon the admission of a quota immigrant under subdivision (d), shall reduce by one the number of immigration visas which may be issued to quota immigrants of the same nationality during the fiscal year in which such immigrant is admitted; but if the Secretary of State finds that it will not be practicable to make such reduction before the end of such fiscal year, then such immigrant shall not be admitted.

"(f) Nothing in this section shall authorize the remission or refunding of a fine, liability to which has accrued under section 16.

"DEPORTATION

"SEC. 14. Any alien who at any time after entering the United States is found to have been at the time of entry not entitled under this act to enter the United States, or to have remained therein for a longer time than permitted under this act or regulations made thereunder, shall be taken into custody and deported in the same manner as provided for in sections 19 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917: Provided, That the Secretary of Labor may, under such conditions and restrictions as to support and care as he may deem necessary, permit permanently to remain in the United States, any alien child who, when under 16 years of age was heretofore temporarily admitted to the United States and who is now within the United States and either of whose parents is a citizen of the United States.

"MAINTENANCE OF EXEMPT STATUS

"SEC. 15. The admission to the United States of an alien excepted from the class of immigrants by clauses (2), (3), (4), (5), or (6) of section 3, or declared to be a nonquota immigrant by subdivision (e) of section 4, shall be for such time as may be by regulations prescribed, and under such conditions as may be by regulations prescribed (including, when deemed necessary for the classes mentioned in clauses (2), (3), (4), or (6) of section 3, the giving of bond with sufficient surety, in such sum and containing such conditions as may be by regulations prescribed) to insure that, at the expiration of such time or upon failure to maintain the status under which admitted, he will depart from the United States.

"PENALTY FOR ILLEGAL TRANSPORTATION

"SEC. 16. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company, or the owner, master, agent, charterer, or consignee of any vessel, to bring to the United States by water from any place outside thereof (other than foreign contiguous territory) (1) any immigrant who does not have an unexpired immigration visa, or (2) any quota immigrant having an immigration visa the visa in which specifies him as a nonquota immigrant.

"(b) If it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any immigrant has been so brought, such person, or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, charterer, or consignee of any such vessel, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each immigrant so brought, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such immigrant for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the immigrant on whose account assessed. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such sums, or while such sums remain unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of an amount sufficient to cover such sums, or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs.

"(c) Such sums shall not be remitted or refunded, unless it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that such person, and the owner, master, agent, charterer, and consignee of the vessel, prior to the departure of the vessel from the last port outside the United States, did not know, and could not have ascertained by the exercise of reasonable diligence: (1) That the individual transported was an immigrant, if the fine was imposed for bringing an immigrant without an unexpired immigration visa, or (2) that the individual transported was a quota immigrant, if the fine was imposed for bringing a quota immigrant the visa in whose immigration visa specified him as being a nonquota immigrant.

"ENTRY FROM FOREIGN CONTIGUOUS TERRITORY

"SEC. 17. The Commissioner General, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall have power to enter into contracts with transportation lines for the entry and inspection of aliens coming to the United States from or through foreign contiguous territory. In prescribing rules and regulations and making contracts for the entry and inspection of aliens applying for admission from or through foreign contiguous territory due care shall be exercised to avoid any discriminatory action in favor of transportation companies transporting to such territory aliens destined to the United States, and all such transportation companies shall be required, as a condition precedent to the inspection or examination under such rules and contracts at the ports of such contiguous territory of aliens brought thereto by them, to submit to and comply with all the requirements of this act which would apply were they bringing such aliens directly to ports of the United States. After this section takes effect no alien applying for admission from or through foreign contiguous territory (except an alien previously lawfully admitted to the United States who is returning from a temporary visit to such territory) shall be permitted to enter the United States unless upon proving that he was brought to such territory by a transportation company which had submitted to and complied with all the requirements of this act, or that he entered, or has resided in, such territory more than two years prior to the time of his application for admission to the United States.

"UNUSED IMMIGRATION VISAS

"SEC. 18. If a quota immigrant of any nationality having an immigration visa is excluded from admission to the United States under the immigration laws and deported, or does not apply for admission to the United States before the expiration of the validity of the immigration visa, or if an alien of any nationality having an immigration visa issued to him as a quota immigrant is found not to be a quota immigrant, no additional immigration visa shall be issued in lieu thereof to any other immigrant.

"ALIEN SEAMEN

"SEC. 19. No alien seaman excluded from admission into the United States under the immigration laws and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe for the ultimate departure, removal, or deportation of such alien from the United States.

"SEC. 20. (a) The owner, charterer, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof who fails to detain on board any alien seaman employed on such vessel until the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival has inspected such seaman (which inspection in all cases shall include a personal physical examination by the medical examiners), or who fails to detain such seaman on board after such inspection or to deport such seaman if required by such immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor to do so, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien seaman in respect of whom such failure occurs. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine, or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs.

"(b) Proof that an alien seaman did not appear upon the outgoing manifest of the vessel on which he arrived in the United States from any place outside thereof, or that he was reported by the master of such vessel as a deserter, shall be prima facie evidence of a failure to detain or deport after requirement by the immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor.

"(c) If the Secretary of Labor finds that deportation of the alien seaman on the vessel on which he arrived would cause undue hardship to such seaman he may cause him to be deported on another vessel at the expense of the vessel on which he arrived, and such vessel shall not be granted clearance until such expense has been paid or its payment guaranteed to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor.

"(d) Section 32 of the immigration act of 1917 is repealed, but shall remain in force as to all vessels, their owners, agents, consignees, and masters, and as to all seamen, arriving in the United States prior to the enactment of this act.

"PREPARATION OF DOCUMENTS

"SEC. 21. (a) Permits issued under section 10 shall be printed on distinctive safety paper and shall be prepared and issued under regulations prescribed under this act.

"(b) The Public Printer is authorized to print for sale to the public by the Superintendent of Public Documents, upon prepayment, additional copies of blank forms of manifests and crew lists to be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor pursuant to the provisions of sections 12, 13, 14, and 36 of the immigration act of 1917.

"OFFENSES IN CONNECTION WITH DOCUMENTS

"SEC. 22. (a) Any person who knowingly (1) forges, counterfeits, alters, or falsely makes any immigration visa or permit, or (2) utters, uses, attempts to use, possesses, obtains, accepts, or receives any immigration visa or permit, knowing it to be forged, counterfeited, altered, or falsely made, or to have been procured by means of any false claim or statement, or to have been otherwise procured by fraud or unlawfully obtained; or who, except under direction of the Secretary of Labor or other proper officer, knowingly (3) possesses any blank, permit, (4) engraves, sells, brings into the United States, or has in his control or possession any plate in the likeness of a plate designed for the printing of permits, (5) makes any print, photograph, or impression in the likeness of any immigration visa or permit, or (6) has in his possession a distinctive paper which has been adopted by the Secretary of Labor for the printing of immigration visas or permits, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

"(b) Any individual who (1) when applying for an immigration visa or permit, or for admission to the United States, personates another or falsely appears in the name of a deceased individual, or evades or attempts to evade the immigration laws by appearing under an assumed or fictitious name, or (2) sells or otherwise disposes of, or offers to sell or otherwise dispose of, or utters, an immigration visa or permit, to any person not authorized by law to receive such document, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

"(c) Whoever knowingly makes under oath any false statement in any application, affidavit, or other document required by the immigration laws or regulations prescribed thereunder, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

"BURDEN OF PROOF

"SEC. 23. Whenever any alien attempts to enter the United States the burden of proof shall be upon such alien to establish that he is not subject to exclusion under any provision of the immigration laws; and in any deportation proceeding against any alien the burden of proof shall be upon such alien to show that he entered the United States lawfully, and the time, place, and manner of such entry into the United States, but in presenting such proof he shall be entitled to the production of his immigration visa, if any, or of other documents concerning such entry, in the custody of the Department of Labor.

"RULES AND REGULATIONS

"SEC. 24. The Commissioner General, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this act; but all such rules and regulations, in so far as they relate to the administration of this act by consular officers, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of State on the recommendation of the Secretary of Labor.

"ACT TO BE IN ADDITION TO IMMIGRATION LAWS

"SEC. 25. The provisions of this act are in addition to and not in substitution for the provisions of the immigration laws, and shall be enforced as a part of such laws, and all the penal or other provisions of such laws, not inapplicable, shall apply to and be enforced in connection with the provisions of this act. An alien, although admissible under the provisions of this act, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of the immigration laws other than this act, and an alien, although admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws other than this act, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of this act.

"STEAMSHIP FINES UNDER 1917 ACT

"SEC. 26. Section 9 of the immigration act of 1917 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel to bring to the United States either from a foreign country or any insular possession of the United States any alien afflicted with idiocy, insanity imbecility, feeble-mindedness, epilepsy, constitutional psychopathic inferiority, chronic alcoholism, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or tranportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival for each and every violation of the provisions of this section, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with any mental defect other than those above specifically named, or physical defect of a nature which may affect his ability to earn a living, as contemplated in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was so afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such mental or physical defect might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $250, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien for whose account assessed. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien who is excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read, or who is excluded by the terms of section 3 of this act as a native of that portion of the Continent of Asia and the islands adjacent thereto described in said section, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that these disabilities might have been detected by the exercise of reasonable precaution prior to the departure of such aliens from a foreign port, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed.

"'If a fine is imposed under this section for the bringing of an alien to the United States, and if such alien is accompanied by another alien who is excluded from admission by the last proviso of section 18 of this act, the person liable for such fine shall pay to the collector of customs, in addition to such fine but as a part thereof, a sum equal to that paid by such accompanying alien for his transportation from his initial point of departure indicated in his ticket, to the point of arrival, such sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the accompanying alien when deported. And no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fines, or while the fines remain unpaid, nor shall such fines be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fines or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof, approved by the collector of customs: Provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to subject transportation companies to a fine for bringing to ports of the United States aliens who are by any of the provisos or exceptions to section 3 of this act exempted from the excluding provisions of said section.'

"SEC. 27. Section 10 of the immigration act of 1917 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 10. (a) That it shall be the duty of every person, including owners, masters, officers, and agents of vessels of transportation lines, or international bridges or toll roads, other than railway lines which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23, bringing an alien to, or providing a means for an alien to come to, the United States, to prevent the landing of such alien in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers. Any such person, owner, master, officer, or agent who fails to comply with the foregoing requirements shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in each case of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; or, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the person, owner, master, officer, or agent of any such vessel, such person, owner, master, officer, or agent shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000, which shall be a lien upon the vessel whose owners, master, officer, or agent violates the provisions of this section, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the appropriate United States court.

"'(b) Proof that the alien failed to present himself at the time and place designated by the immigration officers shall be prima facie evidence that such alien has landed in the United States at a time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers.'

"GENERAL DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 28. As used in this act—

"(a) The term 'United States,' when used in a geographical sense, means the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, the District of Columbia, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands; and the term 'continental United States' means the States and the District of Columbia;

"(b) The term 'alien' includes any individual not a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States, but this definition shall not be held to include Indians of the United States not taxed, nor citizens of the islands under the jurisdiction of the United States;

"(c) The term 'ineligible to citizenship,' when used in reference to any individual, includes an individual who is debarred from becoming a citizen of the United States under section 2169 of the Revised Statutes, or under section 14 of the act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved May 6, 1882, or under section 1996, 1997, or 1998 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, or under section 2 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, as amended, or under law amendatory of, supplementary to, or in substitution for, any of such sections;

"(d) The term 'immigration visa' means an immigration visa issued by a consular officer under the provisions of this act;

"(e) The term 'consular officer' means any consular or diplomatic officer of the United States designated, under regulations prescribed under this act, for the purpose of issuing immigration visas under this act. In case of the Canal Zone and the insular possessions of the United States the term 'consular officer' (except as used in sec. 24) means an officer designated by the President, or by his authority, for the purpose of issuing immigration visas under this act;

"(f) The term 'immigration act of 1917' means the act of February 5, 1917, entitled 'An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States';

"(g) The term 'immigration laws' includes such act, this act, and all laws, conventions, and treaties of the United States relating to the immigration, exclusion, or expulsion of aliens;

"(h) The term 'person' includes individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations;

"(i) The term 'commissioner general' means the Commissioner General of Immigration;

"(j) The term 'application for admission' has reference to the application for admission to the United States and not to the application for the issuance of the immigration visa;

"(k) The term 'permit' means a permit issued under section 10;

"(l) The term 'unmarried,' when used in reference to any individual as of any time, means an individual who at such time is not married, whether or not previously married;

"(m) The terms 'child,' 'father,' and 'mother,' do not include a child or parent by adoption unless the adoption took place before January 1, 1924;

"(n) The terms 'wife' and 'husband' do not include a wife or husband by reason of a proxy or picture marriage.

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATION

"SEC. 29. The appropriation of such sums as may be necessary for the enforcement of this act is hereby authorized.

"ACT OF MAY 19, 1921

"SEC. 30. The act entitled 'An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States,' approved May 19, 1921, as amended and extended, shall, notwithstanding its expiration on June 30, 1924, remain in force thereafter for the imposition, collection, and enforcement of all penalties that may have accrued thereunder, and any alien who prior to July 1, 1924, may have entered the United States in violation of such act or regulations made thereunder may be deported in the same manner as if such act had not expired.

"TIME OF TAKING EFFECT

"SEC. 31. (a) Sections 2, 8, 13, 14, 15, and 16, and subdivision (f) of section 11, shall take effect on July 1, 1924, except that immigration visas and permits may be issued prior to that date, which shall not be valid for admission to the United States before July 1, 1924. In the case of quota immigrants of any nationality, the number of immigration visas to be issued prior to July 1, 1924, shall not be in excess of 10 per cent of the quota for such nationality, and the number of immigration visas so issued shall be deducted from the number which may be issued during the month of July, 1924. In the case of immigration visas issued before July 1, 1924, the four-month period referred to in subdivision (c) of section 2 shall begin to run on July 1, 1924, instead of at the time of the issuance of the immigration visa.

"(b) The remainder of this act shall take effect upon its enactment.

"(c) If any alien arrives in the United States before July 1, 1924, his right to admission shall be determined without regard to the provisions of this act, except section 23.

"SAVING CLAUSE IN EVENT OF UNCONSTITUTIONALITY

"SEC. 32. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby."

And the Senate agree to the same.

DAVID A. REED,
HENRY W. KEYES,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ALBERT JOHNSON,
WILLIAM N. VAILE,
BIRD J. VINCENT,
JOHN E. RAKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the conference report by the Senate, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator wish to disturb the consideration of the pending bill by taking up the conference report?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I understand that under the rules the motion to take up the conference report is privileged.

Mr. KING. I know that it is privileged, but I had hoped that the Senator would let the conference report lie on the table until a later hour this afternoon or to-morrow, in order to give us an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. LODGE. The conference report has got to be read, of course.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Utah will not insist upon delaying the consideration of the conference report. Let us vote on it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course, I may be in the minority, but I am opposed to the conference report, and I am opposed to the bill in its present form; and I think there are a number of its features that, perhaps, ought to be considered.

Mr. SMITH. May we not have the report read, Mr. President, in order that we may know what changes have been made in the bill by the conference report?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course, the conference report will be read. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has moved to agree to the report. The privilege of the conference report extends merely to its presentation. After that any motion in reference to it is in order, and the Senator from Pennsylvania has made a debatable motion.

Mr. ROBINSON. I inquire if the conference report has been printed and is available for the use of the Senate?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The report has been printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I can explain very briefly just what has been done in conference, if the Senator cares to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the conference report has also been printed as a House document.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think the conference report is also printed as a House document, but I have not the number of the document.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have the Senator from Pennsylvania explain the conference report.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. President, the conferees have adopted the Senate bill, in substance. The changes of any importance which were made were these: We have included the provisions of the House bill for certain types of nonquota immigrants. The difference between nonquota immigrants and quota immigrants is merely that the nonquota immigrants are required to furnish full information about themselves before getting a visé of their passports. The only additional classes of persons whom we admit outside of quota immigrants——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania expect to take up the conference report now and to have it acted upon?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I hope to get a vote on the conference report at once.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I think Senators ought to have an opportunity of being present in order to hear the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania; and if the Senator will yield to me for that purpose, I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Fernald	Ladd	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I was just starting to describe the only important matters of difference between the conference bill and the immigration bill as it passed the Senate.

The House has yielded to practically everything of importance that was in dispute between the two Houses, with the exception of the nonquota class of immigrants, and as to that item they have yielded almost all that was in dispute. The only nonquota immigrants permitted by the conference bill beyond those who were permitted by the Senate bill are the wives and the children under 18 of American citizens resident here. That is to say, under the Senate bill the wife of an American citizen resident here would be given a preference within the quota, but would be charged against the quota nevertheless, while under the conference bill a wife under those circumstances would be admitted outside the quota.

The question is important only because of the recent enactment of what is known as the Cable Act, which provides that marriage does not automatically operate to transfer the wife's citizenship to that of the husband. Before the Cable Act these same wives under the same circumstances would have been permitted to enter the United States of their own right as American citizens, but under the Cable Act they do not by their marriage acquire American citizenship. What we have done here has been to admit them as nonquota immigrants. They are not charged against the quota; but we have stricken out the House provisions as to parents and as to husbands and as to skilled labor, and practically all of the House nonquota immigrants who would have come in in great numbers in addition to the quota.

The only other point on which we yielded in that regard was as to professors coming to accredited colleges and ministers of recognized religious denominations; and the number of those who will come in any one year is so small that in our judgment it is negligible.

The next important change lay in the Asiatic exclusion clause. Under the Senate bill, the Asiatic exclusion clause would have taken effect immediately upon enactment. Under the conference bill as it now stands—it went through several phases, but in the shape in which it now stands—the exclusion act will take effect on July 1 of this year. The reason why that seems to us wiser than the Senate bill is that there is a small number of Japanese now on the ocean, and it did not seem fair to clap the law on while they were in transit. When the quota law of 1921 was passed nobody thought about the people who were on the ocean, and the act was made to take effect immediately on its adoption, and Congress within a few weeks afterwards had to pass a joint resolution extending the time in substance so as to admit all of those people who were on the ocean at the time the act of 1921 was signed. We do not want to make that mistake here, and so we have made the exclusion clause take effect July 1.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question in connection with the exclusion clause?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no suggestion in the clause as it has been finally agreed upon that any treaty respecting immigration or exclusion shall be negotiated?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely not any.

Mr. ROBINSON. The conference report, then, recognizes immigration as a domestic issue, and seeks to put no limitation upon the exclusion, except that it shall not take effect until July 1?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely not any restriction whatever. It is treated as a domestic question. It is handled by legislation only, and there is no suggestion of any treaty modification.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. BAYARD. Would not the deferment of the operation of this act so far as Asiatic exclusion is concerned tend to open the door to a ratification of the gentlemen's agreement up until July 1, 1924?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not at all. There is no recognition in the act of the existence of any such thing as a gentlemen's agreement. We do not even go so far as did the quota act of 1921, which referred to such agreements generally. We do not even do that in this act.

Mr. BAYARD. But all other portions of the proposed act go into effect immediately upon its becoming a law, do they not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; not at all. Only so many sections go into effect immediately as are necessary to enable the consuls abroad to issue immigration visas in the meantime; but all of the quota provisions take effect July 1. The present quota law will continue in effect until the last day of June.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not had time to examine this report. I am advised by a gentleman who ought to know that this report very materially modifies the seamen's act. I should like to know whether that is correct.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I agree with the Senator that his informant ought to know, if it is the same informant that has been appealing to me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is Mr. Furuseth.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; Mr. Furuseth has made the same claim to me over and over again, but he is absolutely wrong; and all of the members of the conference committee, so far as I know, feel that he is wrong, with the possible exception of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. JONES of Washington. So that there is not any intention, at any rate, to modify the seamen's act seriously?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely not, and in fact we rejected several suggestions that were made by him because we were fearful that they would change the La Follette Seamen's Act, and our intention has been the exact contrary. We have been anxious to avoid any change in that act, and I am perfectly confident as a matter of law that we have avoided it. I think Mr. Furuseth's objections arise out of his great caution and his great care in this matter, but I think he is overfearful.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator about the so-called Simmons amendment in reference to skilled labor—farm labor.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; I am glad the Senator asked me about that. We have not been able to secure a complete acceptance of it, but we have secured it in substance. Under the act preferences are given within the quota up to the extent——

Mr. McKELLAR. What page of the pamphlet does the Senator refer to?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Section 6, page 4, of the pamphlet. Preferences are given first to the children under 21, the father, the mother, the husband, or the wife of an American citizen who himself is over 21; next, to quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture, and their wives, and their dependent children under the age of 16, if accompanying or immediately following them. Then it is provided that there shall be no priority between those two classes of preferences; that is to say, that relatives and farmers, farm laborers, shall have a common preference within the quota up to 50 per cent of the quota of each nationality.

That, in substance, is the same as the Simmons amendment. The only point of difference lies in this, that the Simmons amendment provided that the governors or legislatures of particular States might put in a claim for so many immigrants. We were fearful, first, that that provision would not be effective, because obviously we can not restrain the immigrant's movements after he is admitted to the United States; and, next, that it would lead to a clash between the authorities of different States. For those reasons the conferees thought it wisest to leave out that feature.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. The change was satisfactory to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I understood that it was satisfactory to the Senator from North Carolina, and that he saw the force of our reasons for leaving out that feature.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator should state that the conferees representing the Senate presented fully the views of those who had advocated that amendment to the bill as it was reported and contended for it, but that the House refused to accede to our view, and the compromise is the one which has just been described by the Senator.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. I supposed it would be assumed, and it was the fact, that we conceived it to be our duty to put forward the thought of the Senate in the adoption of each of these points in disagreement. We did our best to represent the arguments of the sponsors of each of these amendments, and in the main we succeeded in keeping them in.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand that the Senate conferees insisted in conference against the exceptions that were put on in the House, which added many thousands of immigrants to this country?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We did insist, and we insisted against that for day after day, and we succeeded in our insistence as to those classes which will add the largest numbers. Those points on which we yielded are the people who will be fewest in number.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator whether the conferees have met in the last two days for the purpose of revising the proposition and striking out some of the exceptions?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The conferees met on the day that the House directed their conferees to strike out the Japanese-extension provision, which they had recommended. We have not met since that day.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to ask the Senator anything that happened in executive session of the conference, but in the last two or three days has not the chairman of the House conference committee asked the Senate conferees if they would not meet and agree on striking out this provision touching ministers and professors, thereby reducing the number of the nonquota group?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think it was on Saturday or Monday last, I am not sure which, that the chairman of the House conferees applied to us for a further conference on the matter of striking out that clause, and the Senate conferees unanimously declined to open up the agreement, which had already been signed.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think that the conferees were carrying out the instructions of the Senate when they declined that invitation, which would have reduced the number and come closer to the views of the Senate?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am absolutely certain of it, because if we had yielded to that request we might have opened up this agreement, and we would have lost the benefits of this act to a far greater extent——

Mr. HARRISON. Opened up what agreement—the Japanese question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; I am not afraid of opening up the Japanese question, but we have here a bill that is much more exclusive than the House bill. It was bitterly resisted by some of the House conferees. We fought to hold down the number, and we have succeeded. We are all satisfied with the result that we got, and we did not want to jeopardize it.

Mr. HARRISON. What I am interested in is whether or not the conferees carried out the instructions of the Senate. The instructions of the Senate were that we were to abide by 2 per cent of the census of 1890. We voted against any exceptions being made. The House conferees, as we now understand, asked for another conference so that the number of exceptions might be reduced, and we find that the Senate conferees said: "No; we will not do it, because we do not want to open it up."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But we could not agree to a partial conference. If we had agreed to any further conference it would have been on the whole bill, and we had gained so much that we did not want to risk losing what we had gained.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that; but the conferees of the House and Senate have met, and they have adjourned, and they have been called together at the instance of the President, and then they have adjourned, a great many times; and if they had met this time at the invitation of the chairman of the House conferees, they would have come nearer carrying out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask how many additional immigrants are allowed under the compromise provision?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. These nonquota immigrants will be the wives of American citizens living here, children under 18, and ministers and professors. That is the only addition. I can only guess at the number, but I should say that in the total the nonquota immigrants admitted under the conference bill will be about one-fourth of the number that would have been admitted under the House bill. Nobody can do better than guess at it.

Mr. KING. I think it is fair to state, Mr. President, that the arguments which were adduced by the House conferees in favor of certain exemptions coming within the nonquota class, particularly wives of American citizens, were appealing and persuasive. I will say frankly that the arguments appealed to me, and I do not think they were sufficiently stressed in the consideration of the bill when it was before the Senate. However, the chairman of the Senate conferees, the Senator from Pennsylvania, insisted upon the bill in these respects as it came from the Senate, but the House conferees—and I hope I am not betraying any confidence—took the position that certain exceptions should go into the bill, and in that respect they refused at the beginning of the conference to accede to the position taken by the Senate conferees.

I am sure the Senator from Pennsylvania and the other conferees—I shall not speak for myself—attempted to carry out the instructions of the Senate, and I will say frankly that some of the provisions of the Senate bill for which I contended in conference, carrying out the views of the Senate, were not agreeable to me. By that I mean I sought to carry out the wishes of the Senate, though some of them were against my views. As Senators know, I voted against the Senate bill because some of its provisions were not in accord with my views. But as ranking minority member of the conference I attempted to secure a bill that would meet the views of the Senate as expressed in the bill approved by them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Just one word further, Mr. President. I want to explain what was done about the matter of alien seamen. The Senate Immigration Committee had stricken out all references to alien seamen because we thought that matter ought to await further consideration and be treated in a separate bill. The House had a rather complicated and intricate method of handling alien seamen, and we went into conference with this elaborate House provision and nothing at all on the subject in the Senate provisions.

We had two things in mind. In the first place, we did not want to change the provisions of the La Follette seamen's law, not because we were convinced that they were all so wise and beneficial but because we had not studied the subject enough to tinker with that law in any way. All the Senate conferees felt that way about it.

In the next place, the various interests involved, the shipping companies on one part, the immigration authorities on another part, and the seamen's association for a third group, could no two of them agree on what ought to be done about the alien seamen. There was no agreement on any provision by those three groups which were interested in that question.

What we have done finally has been to take that provision in the bill as it passed the House, which was a mere restatement of the present immigration law of 1917 and will be found in section 19 of the law, which merely provides that no alien seaman who is ineligible as an immigrant shall be permitted to land, except temporarily and under such regulations as the Department of Labor may establish. That is the present law. There is no change in that whatever.

Next, we cut out absolutely the landing-card provision, to which Mr. Furuseth objected so strenuously. There is a good deal to be said for the landing-card system, because it furnishes conclusive identification for deserting seamen. On the other hand, the immigration authorities, or some of them, say that it has been and that it is a failure, practically. Mr. Furuseth argued with great force that it treated alien seamen like convicts, and that that was not a reasonable thing to do; and because of those two arguments we succeeded in striking out the whole of the landing-card section, which was section 20, the one immediately following section 19.

All we have done to the alien seaman law that is new has been to provide that after the inspection of alien seamen by the immigration authorities—and that inspection is required under the present law, and there is nothing new about that—the shipowner or master must keep on board any seaman who is indicated by the immigration inspector as unfit to land. There is a loophole in the present law. The present law requires that such seamen be kept on board until examination. It requires that they be examined, but it does not provide any penalty for the ship captain who lets a man slip overboard or on shore between the time of the examination and the time he is to be put in the hospital.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator says that the sailor must be inspected. By whom? By the Public Health Service or by the immigration authorities?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Public Health Service makes the inspection for the immigration authorities. That is under the present law, and that is not changed in any way.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. An examination into the question of whether or not they are entitled to citizenship?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; into the question of whether or not they are entitled to temporary landing.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Under this you take a sailor out of the immigration question——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And in section 15 you put him right back again.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; that is Mr. Furuseth's argument. If the Senator will look at section 3, he will see very clearly that an alien seaman is taken clear out of the class of immigrants; that he is permitted to land just as a government official is permitted to land. He is not treated as an immigrant at all. What we do and what we need to do is to require a physical examination, and to see that a man who is found to have a contagious disease goes to the hospital after the examination. Just let me finish this explanation and I think it will be clear.

It happens in hundreds of cases, under the present law, that the public health doctors who make the examination for the immigration authorities find a man with trachoma, or with some kind of acute venereal disease, or perhaps even with the smallpox. He says to that man, "You stay on board until you can be taken to the hospital at Ellis Island and put in the contagious-disease ward." The moment the inspector leaves the ship the man slips overboard, or onto the pier, as the case may be, and there is nothing in the present law which enables us to punish or fine the captain of that ship. The only change we make in the law is this: That we require the captain to keep that man on board, in the brig, if necessary, until we can get him in the hospital.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the present law permit a seaman to land under such conditions, after he has been examined and found afflicted with a contagious disease?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; it does not permit him to land; but it does not put any penalty on the master who lets him land.

Mr. ROBINSON. The law contemplates that he shall not land?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Precisely.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the amendment is intended only to give effect to the intention of the present law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is exactly it.

Mr. ROBINSON. No alien seaman has been denied the right to land if he is entitled to land under the present law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Every alien seaman who has not some contagious disease has a right to land under the present law, and under this measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does anybody contend that an alien seaman who has a contagious disease ought to be permitted to land?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Nobody contends that, but Mr. Furuseth reads this provision in a different way from the way in which we read it. He thinks that somehow or other we would keep on board every alien seaman who does not have an immigration visa, and he does not seem to have read section 3, which distinctly provides that such a sailor does not need a visa. I can not make him see it, and although practically every member of the conference committee has explained it to him over and over again he simply can not understand it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, is the Senator contending that an alien seaman, under the provisions of the conference report, is taken out of the immigration question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely; and if the Senator will look at section 3 he will see it, I know.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then I will ask the Senator another question. If it is true that a bona fide alien seaman is taken out of the immigration question, how, then, do you provide for taking care of a man who is not a bona fide seaman who comes in as a seaman in order to avoid the immigration law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is another reason for having him examined, as he is, by the public health doctor and by the immigration authorities. If he is a bona fide seaman, he is not within the law at all. If he is not a bona fide seaman, but is an attempted smuggler, he is held up, and under the law the master is punished if he lets him escape.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. How are you going to tell whether or not he is a bona fide seaman?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Sometimes they make a mistake.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can you tell by physical examination?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course not; but you can tell by an oral examination. We were told about one case of a man who pretended he was an able-bodied seaman, and he spoke of "coiling the funnel in the hawse hole." It was very evident he was not a bona fide seaman. That is what we are driving at, and I think we have succeeded in covering such cases. If the Senator will look at section 3, he will see that it is provided plainly there that the term "immigrant" means any alien coming into the United States, and so on, except a bona fide alien seaman serving as such.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Under section 15 it is provided that—

The admission to the United States of an alien excepted from the class of immigrants by clause (2), (3), (4), (5), or (6) of section 3, or declared to be a nonquota immigrant by subdivision (e) of section 4, shall be for such time as may be by regulations prescribed.

What does that mean?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It means that any alien who comes in temporarily, as a tourist, or for a temporary business stay, or any alien in continuous transit through the United States, or any alien lawfully admitted who afterwards goes across the border frequently, or any alien who comes in under a treaty, may be required to give bond, and in reciting the kind of people who may be required to give bond we purposely omitted class 5, which is the alien seamen clause. If the Senator will look at the middle of section 15 he will see that it requires a bond only for classes 2, 3, 4, and 6, and alien seamen come under class 5.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me there might be some question, by reason of the provisions of section 19 and section 3, as to whether there is any change in the matter of alien seamen. This is the provision in section 3, that the word "immigraut" does not include "a bona fide alien seaman serving as such on a vessel arriving at a port of the United States." He is not an immigrant. Then section 19 provides that "No alien seaman excluded from admission into the United States under the immigration laws," can do so and so. If he is not an immigrant, is he excluded under the immigration law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President. There are a great many people, several hundred million of them, who are not immigrants, but who are excluded from admission under the immigration laws. In other words, the immigration laws prescribe who shall be immigrants, and forbid the admission of millions of others, including all the Chinese, the Hindus, and the Malays.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the Senator's contention is that the able seamen on these vessels, although not immigrants, are excluded under our immigration laws?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; under certain conditions they are.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under certain conditions; and they are taken care of under sections 19 and 20 of the committee report?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Precisely. They can be admitted temporarily under regulations, and that is a humane thing, because the Chinese ship coming into our ports with a Chinese crew should not be made a jail while it is in port.

Mr. FLETCHER. I quite agree with that. Then the provision repealing section 32 of the immigration act of 1917 as applied to all seamen arriving in the United States prior to the passage of that act would not interfere with the seamen's act?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not at all, because the substance of section 32 is reenacted into sections that immediately precede it.

Mr. FLETCHER. In other words, they are divided up. Sections 19 and 20 really embrace section 32 with some strengthening provisions.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is practically a reenactment of that section.

Mr. FLETCHER. So the Senator is quite clear there is no interference with the seamen's act if the report shall be adopted?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am very sure, and we have been solicitous to see that there should not be.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator's attention been called by the Senator from Minnesota to a communication which, I think, was sent to a number of Senators—I did not receive one, however—by Mr. Furuseth or his representative under this date? An excerpt from the communication is as follows, but if the Senator from Minnesota called attention to this I shall not do so:

> The sections to which I refer are sections 19 and 21 of the conference committee print of May 8, 1924. I understand that section 20 has already been stricken out of the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is the one that had to do with landing cards.

Mr. KING. The letter continues:

> In evidence of my assertion that the original purpose in drafting this bill was in no way to conflict with the seamen's act, I call attention to the provisions of section 3, which exclude bona fide alien seamen from the definition of immigrants. Section 19, however, which was written into the bill in conference appears to be in direct conflict with both the letter and the spirit of section 3. This section has the effect, in view of the rigid provisions of the quota requirements and the citizenship provisions, of severely restricting the right of the seaman to come on shore and seek employment in another vessel, which is, of course, the fundamental right guaranteed to him by the seamen's act.
> The subjection of the seaman to the absolute control of the master of the vessel while in our ports is made absolute by paragraph (b) of section 21. This paragraph provides:
> > "Proof that an alien seaman did not appear on the outgoing manifest of the vessel on which he arrived in the United States, from any place outside thereof, or that he was reported by the master of such vessel as a deserter, shall be prima facie evidence of a failure to detain or deport after requirement by the immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor."
> This means that no seaman will be permitted to leave his vessel even for a visit on shore, nor will he be permitted under any circumstances to ship in another vessel, as provided in the seamen's act.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I fully agree with Mr. Furuseth's idea that the men ought not to be detained on the ship, but I reassert that he is overanxious and that there is nothing in the provisions to which he calls attention that could possibly be used to hold the men on ship in such a fashion. The last section that was put in was inserted at the request of the district attorney of New York, who has found it impossible to convict the masters of ships that come in with double crews and go out with the scant requirements of the law. They are smugglers of immigrants. We have to be able to convict them for that smuggling. Unless we can have a presumption that they intended to smuggle from the fact that their outgoing manifest did not include the men who were on the incoming manifest we are never going to get any convictions. No master could hold his men on ship by virtue of that section. If he tried it they could be gotten out on habeas corpus in a minute. Unless the Secretary of Labor should undertake to make such a preposterous regulation as that no alien seaman should leave his ship—of course he never would attempt to make such a regulation—they have a vested right to come on shore under this bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is not clear to my mind how the provisions of the bill distinguish between bona fide and mala fide seamen.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is done in this way: When an immigrant reaches our port an immigration inspector, with the doctor, goes on board the vessel.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am talking about the seamen, not the immigrant.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The immigration inspector goes on board the vessel and inspects every member of the crew and every member on the passenger list. He finds some that claim to be government officials and others that claim to be seamen employed on the ship, and he has to use his judgment. If he finds a man claiming to be a government official who he thinks is not a government official, he says, "You go to Ellis Island for examination by the board of inquiry," and the same thing if he finds a seaman whom he does not think is a bona fide seaman.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That takes the seaman into the immigration question if he is taken to Ellis Island.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course. Every human being that comes to this country from another country has to be examined by an immigration inspector. Everybody, including government officials, has to pass some scrutiny.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And the seamen on the ships?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Including the seamen on the ships. The crew of the vessel is inspected just like the passengers on the vessel and they have to show the bona fides of their status just the same as an ambassador who comes here. He is outside the immigration laws if he presents evidence that he is a real ambassador, and the same thing is true of an alien seaman. They have to show something to establish their status. That is the exact situation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then what is to be done with him?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the inspector says that he is a fraud, that he is not what he pretends to be, he sends him to Ellis Island or similar detention station, where he is examined before the board of inquiry consisting of three judges. If he thinks the man is not a fraud he passes him and he comes right in. It has been worked that way for many years.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator thinks he is restoring existing law so far as the seamen are concerned?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We do not restore it, but we do not disturb it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But under the law that is not now disturbed, we know and there is plenty of evidence to show that shipowners have shipped in a great many immigrants in the hold of the ship or as extra hands in the crew, who have landed here and mingled with the population and did not return to the country from whence they came.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is there any provision now compelling a master to take out as many as he brings in?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; there is not; but we make him subject to a very high fine if he does not take out the people that he brought in, and we put the burden on him to show why they are not on the ship as it goes out.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator does not mean to say that the master of a ship will be fined if he does not take out the same people he brought in?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We fine him unless he shows some good reason for not taking them out.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As a matter of fact, the law provides that he can not be fined unless it is shown that there has been collusion between the master and the man who has deserted or left the ship.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Under this provision we presume that if a man is missing, he is missing with the collusion of the master, and the burden is on the master to show that there was no collusion. He can do that very easily if he shows that the man reshipped through his consulate on some other ship. He can do it if he shows a man deserted. What we want to do is to catch just the kind of smuggling which the Senator speaks about.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask just one other question? Is there any provision that says a master shall take back as many members of the crew as he had when he came to this country?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; there is not, and there ought not to be, because sometimes they come ashore and die; sometimes they desert, and it is not his fault. Every spring shoals of men desert from New York and go to work on the Great Lakes, and it would be a great hardship on a ship to make it take back as many men as it brought here under those circumstances.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it not reasonable to assume that the ship would not bring in a larger crew than was necessary to operate the ship?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is reasonable to assume that it would not; but as a matter of fact they all carry a few more than the minimum requirement under the law. If we should have any such provision as the Senator has in mind, then the sailing of every big ocean liner could be held up by the strike of half a dozen waiters. We do not want to expose them to that situation. Everybody admits that would be unreasonable. The Senator can understand the situation. In the case of a big liner like the Aquitania, if half an hour before sailing time six or eight waiters walked down the gangplank she could not sail if such a provision were in the law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to say to the Senator that I should regret very much if the conference report should be adopted without giving us plenty of time to consider it further.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We have been considering this matter for four months. We have given careful thought and study to all of Mr. Furuseth's suggestions, and many of them are good. I think that his apprehensions are groundless.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am sure we all quite agree that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has rendered great service to the country in his work on the Immigration Committee and in helping fashion this particular piece of legislation. But it seems to me that when the Senate has deliberately voted upon propositions and conferees have been appointed, they are supposed to carry out the action of the Senate. The conferees have woefully failed to do that. What right have we, after we have passed on a measure here and the conferees have been appointed, not to protest when they have deliberately gone against the instructions of the Senate? No; there was no motion to instruct. It was not necessary. We had a right to expect that the action of the Senate would be carried out in the action of the conferees, and as best possible they would report back the bill for our final approval as we had interpreted it here. I say that has not been done.

The main question in the consideration of immigration legislation when before the Senate was how many immigrants should be permitted to come into the United States. There was a difference of opinion and various views expressed as to whether the number should be 160,000 or 250,000 or no limitation at all. Some Senators voted for the 1890 census and some for the 1910 census. Some thought the percentage should be 1 per cent, others 3 per cent, and so on. But all agreed that some definite number should be fixed to come into the United States annually. The suggestion was not at all presented to the Senate as embodied in the House bill that above a certain quota on a certain census a lot of exceptions could be made and that they might come in above that quota.

This question is of great importance. Last year, in 1923, 337,000 immigrants came to the United States above the quota. So the Senate desired to restrict immigration; and by an overwhelming vote it reduced the number which should come to 160,000 annually, or 2 per cent, based on the census of 1890. The House also provided that 2 per cent, based on the census of 1890, should be permitted to come; but in addition to that they provided that many could come without the quota; that wives of citizens of the United States could come from foreign countries; children could come from foreign countries; and tourists and ministers could also come and not be counted within the quota. Yet as the conference report comes in it not only bases the quota on the 2 per cent of the census of 1890, which is right, if the quota were closed there, but it allows many exceptions to be made so that more can come in.

There is no Senator here who can tell what number may now come in beyond the quota of 2 per cent based on the census of 1890. We do know that many will come in, because many have come in the past. As I have said, 337,000 came in last year above the quota. Of course, the bill as contained in the conference report is better than the present law, because 337,000 could come in under the present law, not counting the exemptions, and, adding the exemptions, 673,000 came in last year. So we have "marched up the hill and marched down again."

I did not think, Mr. President, that when three of the Senators who were on the conference committee voted against the 2 per cent quota based on the 1890 census it would mean that they would go into conference and adopt the House provision containing a lot of exceptions. If I had thought so, there would have been a fight made on the floor of the Senate that conferees be appointed who would carry out the action of the Senate. Here we are with our hands tied. We may vote against the conference report, yes, and a majority of us could do so and send the report back to conference; and it would be the best thing that could be done; but it may be that if we send it back to conference we shall never have it returned.

A startling thing to me is that the members of the conference committee say, "We have put forth our best efforts to carry out the views of the Senate"; and yet the chairman of the conference committee admits upon the floor of the Senate that two or three days ago the chairman of the conferees on the part of the House came to him and invited him into another conference in order to wipe out the provision as to the number of ministers and professors who could come within the exceptions, and he declined the invitation. Does that show that the conferees carried out the instructions of the Senate?

Ah, Mr. President, we had thought we were traveling on the road to real restrictive immigration, but we have not been. Now, I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts if he desires that I shall do so.

Mr. LODGE. I will wait until the Senator from Mississippi yields the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to talk, perhaps, for three or four hours, and I do not wish to tire the Senator by keeping him standing up.

Mr. LODGE. It would tire me if I should listen.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there are times when matters occur here that are of interest, and this question is one of great interest to the American people. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], who is one of the finest characters whom it has ever been my pleasure to know, is not so much of a restrictionist as am I. He was against the proposition to take the census of 1890 as the basis; he was also against the "racial origins" method, and he refused to be a member of the conference committee because he did not feel that he should do so inasmuch as the views of the Senate were contrary to his views. However, Mr. President, it would have been the right thing when the invitation came from the chairman of the House conference committee to go back into conference on the proposition to reduce the number of exceptions under the law, which we are now proposing to pass, to have accepted the invitation.

Members of the conference committee have not been afraid to go into conference since this bill was passed by the Senate. They have performed like Japanese in the game of jujutsu with respect to the Japanese exclusion question. The Senate said what it would do by way of excluding the Japanese, and yet, at the instance of the President of the United States, the conference committee wrote into the conference report, without authority, that the exclusion should not take effect until 1926, I think it was. The proposition went to the House of Representatives; that body would not stand for it, and it repudiated that action. Then the conferees went back into conference on that question. The President again sent for them; and they have been in hot water on the proposition all the time.

Why, in the interest of the American people and civilization and of restrictive immigration, did they not go into conference this last time and try to reduce the number who could come in by eliminating the ministers and teachers, at least?

Oh, I wish that we could write upon the statute books now an immigration law restricting immigration to 2 per cent based on the census of 1890 and provide that in 1925 only 160,000 immigrants shall come within the portals of the United States and after 1925 the number shall be 150,000, according to the Reed amendment. But that has not been done. The bill provides that 150,000 may enter after 1925, but it also admits all others within the exceptions. It goes beyond the present law in the cases of the exceptions, because the present law does not make the wife an exception. It excepts children under 18 years of age; but in this instance the conferees have written into the law that wives also may come in as well as children under 18 years of age, and ministers and professors, and there are a number of other exceptions.

It is said the conferees had to do it because of the Cable law. Why, God bless you, Mr. President, they came in within the quota under the present law. If a citizen of the United States wants to marry some woman living in a foreign country, let him take his chances of bringing his wife in within the quota. So the children should also come in within the quota. Under this bill if a foreign-born citizen of the United States has a mother in some foreign land solely dependent upon him and without a relative over there, she can not come in without the quota, but she is given a preference within the quota. Why not provide that wives and children may come in within the quota and give them a preferential right, but do not go any further than that?

Mr. President, I have expressed my views. I do not approve of the action of the conferees. I presume I will have to take what they have given to me, but to-morrow I will introduce a bill that will wipe out these exceptions, and if I can get enough help in the Congress I will try and secure its passage.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the purpose of a conference, as I have always understood it, is to settle existing differences between the two Houses. I have never seen a bill of any importance, especially a large bill containing many provisions which was finally agreed to and passed by adopting the views of only one side. The Senate provided for no exemptions as they are commonly called, but the House provided for the exemptions that had been previously in the law, covering, for instance, wives, parents, children, clergymen, and some unimportant lesser classes. Therefore, there was an absolute difference between the two bodies. One was for no exemptions, while the other was for all the existing exemptions. It was one of those cases where a compromise was inevitable.

I am strongly in favor of the attitude taken by the Senate; I believe in the extinction of all exemptions; that is, amending all those classes in the quota, although I am aware there is one which has been retained which it will be extremely difficult to give up and which has a real sentimental importance.

Under those circumstances the conferees on the part of the Senate went into conference, and the Senate never had more loyal or more faithful conferees on any bill of which I have ever known. They fought for the views of the Senate from the beginning to the end. Of course they have made one or two compromises, but they have achieved success in almost every instance. From the point of view of the division between the two Houses, the Senate side has been most successful.

But, Mr. President, when you come to judge a conference report everything depends upon how you look at the general subject. To me the general result of this bill far outweighs any other consideration. It contains certain great provisions on which both bodies are agreed which are infinitely more important in the passage of the coming years than any single item could be.

This legislation, if it shall be maintained, is going to stretch forward into the centuries; it is going to change the current of infusion in the blood of the American population; it is going to make a change for the better in the quality of our immigration, a change far more important than any that has ever yet been made in the much-traversed and much-considered question of immigration to the United States. I regret that our conferees thought it necessary, in view of the opposition of the House, to yield on the question of excluding the exemptions from the quota, but compared to the general importance of the bill that is a small point.

Mr. President, the difference, as it seems to me, between my attitude and that of my friend from Mississippi is that he could not at the end resist bringing it into politics. I have always been proud of the fact, and never more so than during the debate in this Congress, that immigration, which affects the quality of all the people of the United States in the future, has never been a political question in any sense. This bill was discussed; it was passed; it has come back here from the conference, and until this moment there has not been a trace of politics in regard to it. Without reference to politics we have fought side by side.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. No; I have only a little to say, and if the Senator will allow me, I should like to finish what I am saying. Then I will yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator alluded to "this moment." I wondered if he felt that I had let politics enter into this discussion.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator certainly has not shown it until this moment in this speech.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what I have said that leads the Senator to think I have done so now.

Mr. LODGE. I have never seen a man work harder and render better service to a great cause than the Senator from Mississippi, and I say that with great pleasure.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not tried to get any politics into this proposition now. I was expressing the views, or what were the views, of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LODGE. They are my views still.

Mr. HARRISON. And they are still my views, but evidently they are not now the Senator's views.

Mr. LODGE. But that does not alter my feeling that the great end is more important than any one detail. The chairman of the conference, who has labored night and day on this matter for many weeks, and has done as much as any man could do, and who is one of the ablest and best Senators in this body, and who has given himself to it without any holding back, with the utmost freedom, has fought this matter at every stage, and has got the best bill, I believe, that any man could hope to get. If there was a suggestion made from the House after the conference report had been signed to reopen that matter, everybody who listens to me knows that it would have reopened the Japanese question—that is the plain English of it—and he refused to reopen it. You can not open a little bit of a conference. If you open it, you open it all; and that question was the one that was in the public mind, that was of the utmost gravity to a great section of the United States, on which feeling was heated, where it was important to use violence or harshness in debate which might by any possibility reflect upon a friendly nation, and on which it was desirable to get a final conclusion as soon as possible, for which reasons the Senator from Pennsylvania very wisely and properly declined to reopen the signed conference report.

Mr. President, in my judgment, the Senate has been splendidly represented on that conference, not merely by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], but by the Senators who sat with him, although they may have disagreed somewhat among themselves. In my judgment, they have done the best that could be done; and I am extremely anxious that the work being now done shall receive its final approval by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I do not care to take the floor now, because I am going to speak on a different subject. I was wondering if the chairman of the committee desired to take a vote now, or if the Senate is prepared to take a vote at this time?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; I should like to have a yea-and-nay vote now.

Mr. SMITH. I do not care to cut off anyone who desires to discuss this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. The first question before the Senate is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report? That has not been agreed to yet.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not ask unanimous consent. I have no objection to his moving that the Senate take up the report.

Mr. LODGE. Unanimous consent was not requested by the Senator, I think, if the Senator will pardon me. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania moved that the Senate agree to the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must state that under the rules of the Senate the motion can not be put in that way. We will first have to get the privilege of proceeding to the consideration of the report, and that is before the Senate now.

Is there objection to proceeding to the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. KING. I will not object to the Senator from Pennsylvania moving to take up the conference report for consideration; but, of course, he has a right to do so, and I am advised that many Senators desire to have the report immediately disposed of. While I shall not filibuster or attempt to prevent the conference report being laid before the Senate, I regret that such hasty action is deemed necessary. I do not feel that I can consent to its being taken up for the reason that I have some apprehension, notwithstanding the lucid explanation made by the chairman of the conferees, in regard to the alien seamen provision of the bill. A memorandum has been handed to me just a few moments ago, which I have not had time to peruse, in addition to the note to which I called the Senator's attention, which seems to raise some legal questions as to the effect of the provisions of this bill upon the existing seamen's act; and in view of that fact I do not wish to have it taken up to-day. I should be very glad to have consideration of the report go over until to-morrow; but the Senate has the power and if it is asserted, of course, I shall be overcome. I want to add that I did not sign the conference report for the reason that I was dissatisfied with the manner in which the alien seamen provisions were dealt with, and because of other fundamental features with which I did not agree.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the disposition of the conference report the unfinished business now before the Senate—that is, the War Department appropriation bill—shall continue to be the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that after the consideration of the conference report the unfinished business shall be then taken up.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. If a motion should be made to take up the conference report, would that thereby set aside the Army appropriation bill, and also this unanimous-consent request that is now being asked?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the request is made in order that it shall not be set aside.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is asked in order to make sure that it does not displace the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I am making a parliamentary inquiry as to whether it would.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would decide that it would not. Without objection, that order will be made. The question before the Senate is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report?

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7995) to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania and Mr. LODGE called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; Mr. President, we are not going to vote for just a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a further question about the alien seamen provision. His statement with respect to the first paragraph of section 20 cleared my mind of some of the difficulties that had been suggested by Mr. Furuseth. I do not understand the effect of subsection (b) of section 20, which reads:

> Proof that an alien seaman did not appear upon the outgoing manifest of the vessel on which he arrived in the United States from any place outside thereof, or that he was reported by the master of such vessel as a deserter, shall be prima facie evidence of a failure to detain or deport after requirement by the immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor.

Will the Senator from Pennsylvania explain briefly to the Senate the purpose and effect of that provision? Of course I understand that it relates to a rule of evidence.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall be glad to do so, Mr. President.

It has been found in the past that where immigrants are smuggled in in the guise of alien seamen the master pleads ignorance of their intention to desert, and the Government is unable to prove that the master connived with the smuggled immigrant to come to this country and remain. A ship comes in with a large crew showing on its inbound manifest. It goes out with the bare requirements of the law. A large number of those who showed on the incoming manifest do not appear on the outgoing manifest; and the courts have held that those facts standing by themselves do not raise a prima facie case against the master when he is prosecuted for smuggling immigrants. The purpose of the subdivision to which the Senator calls attention, and the only purpose, is to throw the burden of proof over upon the master to show that those missing seamen deserted without his knowledge, or that they died, or that they were held in hospitals.

Under the present law and the present state of the decisions, the United States in any such prosecution has to prove all those negatives. What we want to do is to put the burden on the master to show what became of these missing seamen—either that they deserted, or that they went to a hospital, or that they died, or that they went to their consulates and reshipped on some other foreign ship. The master knows, and the United States does not know without an investigation that would take a year in every case; and it seemed to us that this was a proper enough provision, to put the burden on the master to account for those missing men. It has no other purpose. It will not serve to keep the men in jail, as Mr. Furuseth at one time feared that it would. I think his doubt on that point has been dispelled; and it can not in any way work hardship on the seamen themselves.

Mr. ROBINSON. It merely shifts the burden of proof from the Government to the master of the vessel in cases of that kind?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Precisely; and it does not alter the status of the seamen themselves.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have no apologies to make for the humble part I took in the conference report. This is by far the best bill on this subject we have ever had in the United States. It will do more for our country than any other bill that has been passed by Congress, in my humble judgment, since I have been a Member of the Senate. I fought for exclusion of all immigration for five years, in the committee, on the floor of the Senate, and in conference, but I could not get what I wanted in conference. I never have been able to get, from people that did not agee with me, all that I would like to get. The men who construct things in this world are the men who can be criticised, and it is far easier to criticize than it is to construct, and it is often necessary to compromise and get the best you can in order to get anything. Those who opposed restrictive immigration in the House voted against this conference report. They think it is too restrictive. The enemies of restrictive immigration are hoping the Senate will vote down this conference report and defeat all hope of legislation this session.

We have here a measure that I believe meets with the approval of the country. If I had had my way, we would not have had any immigration for five years; and with the exemptions I made I think it would have been far better if my bill had passed, because then we would have had no embarrassment with Japan or any other country. We would only have allowed the fathers and mothers over 55 years of age and children under 18, of American citizens residing in this country, to come here, and not so many would have come, and not near so many would have come in as under the Senate bill.

I am sorry my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] does not agree with me. I did not agree with everything he did. I recall, if I am not mistaken, that the Senator from Mississippi made the motion to increase the percentage from 1 to 2 per cent after the Senate had voted for 1 per cent here. I wanted to shut out immigration entirely for five years, and when my amendment was voted down I voted for 1 per cent, and the Senator from Mississippi certainly voted for 2 per cent if he did not make the motion, while I voted for 1 per cent. I did not get mad with him because of that. The Senator from Mississippi is on the Committee on Immigration and has done a splendid work. He deserves the thanks of his people and the country for the work that he has done; but this conference report was a compromise, and while I thought the House Members were hard-headed at times, when they would not agree with me in consenting to the provisions of the Senate bill, I have never seen men work harder or more conscientiously than the four members of the Senate committee, my colleagues, and the five members from the House. We worked for weeks on this measure, worked eight hours a day and more, and we had only one thought in view, and that was what was the best thing for our country, for our children, and our grandchildren.

While I was disappointed in not getting a more restrictive bill I am proud of the record that was made in this bill. If I felt as some of the other Senators who have criticized it feel about it I would vote against it. I would not vote for a bill if I raised so many objections to it. I do not believe they are going to do that, however, for they know this is the best immigration bill ever passed by Congress. I think the Senate and the country understand that we have done remarkably well, and that we have gotten a better bill than we ever hoped to get a few years ago.

I opposed President Coolidge's recommendations relative to Japanese exclusion, I insisted that Congress alone should control in immigration matters—it is not a question to be settled by treaty—I favored and fought for exclusion of Japanese and am glad Congress took that view of it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate long to make any argument against this conference report, because I know that it is useless, and I am not in the habit of making an argument and speaking to a question unless I hope to effect something; but this report, I do not hesitate to say, is a very great disappointment to me.

We have been working upon this immigration bill for several weeks. It was the general understanding that we were going to effect some real, substantial restriction upon foreign immigration. We had a very good bill passed by the Senate. There was very great restriction under it, and that bill met the approbation of the American people, as was shown by letters doubtless to every Member of the Senate and by the press at large without any regard to politics.

The American people wanted restriction. We gave them reasonable restriction in the bill as passed here, and in the conference it has been largely abandoned, very largely. The conference report is some better than the present law, and I will vote for it; largely it is a legislative abortion.

Mr. President, we expected a limitation to about 162,000 immigrants by providing that their relatives and friends and certain other exceptions should come with preference under the quota clause, and that made ample provision for them. It prevented all hardships, all of what we might call cruel separations of families. I would not have agreed to a bill that did not provide preferences for those relatives and some chance for them to come here and join those who were already in America and on the way to become American citizens. This decreased the number of other immigrants.

It is well known now that instead of having 160,000 immigrants admitted we will have about 300,000 with these exceptions. This includes those coming under the quota law and those excepted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIELDS. In a moment; that we have now about 225,000 who come in from Mexico and Canada annually; about 25,000 sailors who smuggle themselves in. Then there is a large number smuggled in from Cuba, from Canada, and from Mexico, both orientals and Europeans, under the present law, and, Mr. President, there is now possible an immigration to this country from all sources, some six or seven hundred thousand annually, and it is against the will of the people. It is a menace to American citizenship and American institutions.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield first to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will withhold my question.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee is familiar with this legislation, because he is on the committee, and he knows how hard I have fought, and he knows my extreme views, which are more extreme than his own. The Senator from Tennessee is criticizing the allowing of Mexicans and Canadians to come in. I made a motion, which the Senate voted down, to place them under the quota. The conferees certainly should not be criticized because they did not try to bring them under the quota, since the Senate voted otherwise.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has made no such question. I simply referred to the immigrants who are coming here from those two countries, Canada and Mexico, as showing the aggregate of foreigners who are now entering the United States annually.

I voted to include Canada and Mexico in the quota law. I thought when we were passing the bill we were restricting immigration, but with all these exceptions, more than there were under the old law, we have accomplished comparatively nothing.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator explain just what exceptions he thinks we have added that are going to accomplish such terrible results? Does he think that the addition of persons born in the Western Hemisphere is going to increase the immigration over what the bill as it passed the Senate would have allowed in?

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will just read the exceptions set out in his conference report, he will know exactly what I mean, for I refer to every single one of them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am very glad to read them. We have talked about wives of American citizens. Next is the immigrant previously lawfully admitted, and returning from a temporary visit abroad. Does the Senator disagree with that exception?

Mr. SHIELDS. I stand on the Senate bill, excluding every one, and only giving them a preference under the quota. There can not be any doubt about my position or any doubt about the facts, because they are written into the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The doubt arises out of the fact that the same exceptions are in the bill as it passed the Senate, about which the Senator was so proud, and I was wondering why it is any worse——

Mr. SHIELDS. We did not allow them here absolutely, but allowed them to come in under the quota clause, and then you gave up, and opened the floodgates of immigration into this country, against the very spirit of the Senate in passing the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. On the contrary, Mr. President, the bill as it passed the Senate admitted them as nonimmigrants. They did not even have to give their pedigrees. Now they are admitted as nonquota.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, well; that is mere language. I am talking about people who are getting into this country, not about playing on words. The man can come here whether you call him a nonimmigrant or a quota immigrant.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator has taken the liberty of calling the conference report a "legislative abortion," and I want to show how much has been aborted. The Senator points out that clause allowing the returning absentees to come in. I say it was in the bill as it passed the Senate, for which the Senator voted with such pride.

The next exception is immigrants who were born in the Dominion of Canada and other countries in the Western Hemisphere. I suppose the Senator objects to that. In fact, I know he does, because he called attention to it as one of the items that made this a "legislative abortion." I say that in the bill as it passed the Senate, for which the Senator was so proud to vote, that class was absolutely excepted, and more so. This is more restrictive than was the provision in the bill as it passed the Senate, before we created this "abortion," as the Senator calls it.

Mr. HARRISON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The next one——

Mr. SHIELDS. I mentioned the Canadians and the Mexicans as showing the number that come here, and not as exceptions. I know that under the old law they were allowed to come. They were not within the quota law, and they were not within the quota law as the Senate passed the bill. Some of us tried to include them and failed. There is no controversy about that. What I am attacking is that all these exceptions were to come under the quota law in the bill as passed by the Senate, and you take them out of that and let them come in independent of the quota law, and that raises the number who can come in under the quota provision.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, that is just what I am trying to make clear to the Senator from Tennessee, that these people were not under the quota in the bill as it passed the Senate, for which he voted so proudly. The temporary absentees were not under the quota when he voted for the bill as it passed the Senate. The persons born in the Western Hemisphere were not under the quota then any more than they are now, and, finally, the students under 15 years of age, the last class of exceptions, were admitted as nonimmigrants and not under the quota before the bill became an "abortion." The very points the Senator says caused it to be a "legislative abortion" were in the bill when it was such a monument of jurisprudence that he was so proud to vote for it.

Mr. SHIELDS. But they were under the quota clause. The Senator is constantly playing upon words and attributing arguments to me which I did not make.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They were not under the quota clause then and are not now.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Before the Senator yields to the Senator from Mississippi permit me to say that I did not hear the Senator from Pennsylvania answer the Senator from Tennessee when he said that 300,000 or 350,000 could come in under the bill as reported by the conferees. Can they?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No, Mr. President; the reason the Senator did not hear me answer was that when I tried to answer the Senator from Tennessee would not yield. They can not.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many can?

Mr. HEFLIN. How many, in the judgment of the Senator, can come in?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In the next three years, 161,000 immigrants can come in, because that is what 2 per cent based on the census of 1890 would mean. In addition to that, the wives and children of American citizens who live here can come in. The Senator would not want to keep them out, would he?

Mr. HEFLIN. How many of them can come in under this new provision?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The whole world, if they happen to be married to American citizens, who live here; but, as a matter of fact, it will not be over eight or ten thousand a year. This does not admit the wives of unnaturalized persons. It refers only to wives of citizens who live here.

Mr. SHIELDS. How many came in last year?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the exemptions last year in the quota law, which is about to expire, were so broad that the number who came in almost equaled the number under the quota.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is about the same as the number now.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, no. We allowed domestic servants, and skilled labor, and all kinds of relatives, and there was a list of exemptions of about 20 different classes of people, which we have cut down ruthlessly. The only exemptions allowed here, that were not allowed in the bill as it passed the Senate covers wives of American citizens and the little children, and ministers of the Gospel. Those exemptions will not total 10,000 people in a year.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator left out professors.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; I omitted professors. That, perhaps, will add 200 or 250.

Mr. HARRISON. In the present law—I am not talking about the Cable law, but the present law—wives were not an exception, were they?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have not the text of the present law before me.

Mr. HARRISON. I have the text here.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. HARRISON. It leaves out wives. Children are an exception in the present law, but wives are not. In the bill the Senator has brought in he has children and wives; so he has broadened it, as the Senator from Tennessee has stated.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Before the Cable law was passed those wives were American citizens, and they came in without hindrance.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the Cable law the wives came in under the quota. They do not come in above the quota. They come in within the quota.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator think that the wife of an American citizen should be held back by a quota law?

Mr. HARRISON. I think that we ought to have a quota law——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. So do I; but will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has asked me a question I am glad he asked. I voted to limit immigration to a quota; and when I did, I voted to keep out wives, and to keep out children, and to keep out mothers, and fathers, and professors, and ministers, and that is what I meant. If those people want to come in, they should have a right to come in, within the quota. I know that you have left a hole here which certain people will use as a subterfuge to bring more into the country. There are some people who would not mind paying $3 for a marriage license in order to get somebody into this country, and they will do it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. Has the Senator from Mississippi the report?

Mr. HARRISON. I have.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator read the exemptions that are made under that report?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield that the Senator from Tennessee may ask the Senator from Mississippi a question.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand the Senator from Minnesota yields that the report may be read.

Mr. HARRISON. I will send it to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I came in during the discussion, and did not have a copy of the report, and hence I asked the Senator from Mississippi for it. These exemptions, I understand, come in under the clause covering nonquota immigrants. Am I correct in that? I think I am. Those exemptions read as follows:

(a) An immigrant who is the unmarried child under 18 years of age, or the wife of a citizen of the United States who resides therein at the time of the filing of a petition under section 9;

(b) An immigrant previously lawfully admitted to the United States, who is returning from a temporary visit abroad;

(c) An immigrant who was born in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Mexico, the Republic of Cuba, the Republic of Haiti, the Dominican Republic, the Canal Zone, or an independent country of Central or South America, and his wife, and his unmarried children under 18 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him;

(d) An immigrant who continuously for at least two years immediately preceding the time of his application for admission to the United States has been, and who seeks to enter the United States solely for the purpose of, carrying on the vocation of minister of any religious denomination, or professor of a college, academy, seminary, or university; and his wife, and his unmarried children under 18 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him; or

(e) An immigrant who is a bona fide student at least 15 years of age and who seeks to enter the United States solely for the purpose of study at an accredited school, college, academy, seminary, or university, particularly designated by him and approved by the Secretary of Labor, which shall have agreed to report to the Secretary of Labor the termination of attendance of each immigrant student, and if any such institution of learning fails to make such reports promptly the approval shall be withdrawn.

Then it proceeds to give the quota. That appears in the report, and I shall not read it all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, before the bill was sent to conference we had a lengthy discussion here that took up several hours of the afternoon. It was decided that the front door and the back door should be closed to immigrants, but the bill was sent to conference with what I would call the side door open after the back and front doors had been closed. We were told that the side door would be closed in conference, and the very able and distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] now assures us that this has been done. I do not doubt his sincerity, I do not doubt his good intentions to close the door, but I fail to see that the door has been closed.

I find also, I believe, in the proposed conference report a nullification of section 4 of the La Follette Seamen's Act. Therefore I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate while I discuss the bill as it now comes to us from conference. It seems to me that in the last two weeks we have been rather rushing legislation through, discovering later that we had certain provisions incorporated in it that a good many Senators did not know had been placed in the legislation.

The purpose of the bill is to limit the number of certain kinds of alien immigrants and to prohibit the coming of others into the United States. Such alien persons as are ineligible to become citizens are excluded as immigrants. Certain persons who are not capable of becoming citizens are excluded, because they are subnormal, afflicted with certain diseases, hold certain opinions, or because they can not read.

Legally admissible immigrants are limited to certain specified numbers from each country. Beyond those legally permitted to come as immigrants, none may come unless they are specifically admitted as being outside of the immigration laws.

Section 3 of the bill specifies who may come as not included in or subject to the immigration laws. Among the persons so listed, for the first time in our history, we have the seamen. Section 3 reads in part as follows:

(5) A bona fide alien seaman serving as such on a vessel arriving at a port of the United States and seeking to enter temporarily the United States solely in the pursuit of his calling as a seaman.

This section, it would seem, places the seaman outside of the immigration laws as long as he is a bona fide seaman. The presumption from the language would be that the bill will in some way distinguish between a bona fide seaman and a person who pretends to be a seaman in order to violate the immigration laws, but no such distinction is made as far as I can find.

According to reports of the Commissioner of Immigration, our ports last year were visited by 1,018,000 alien seamen. Those men were employed in our commerce. The free flow of commerce is one of the necessities of existing civilization, and the less interference with those men the better; but among them may be men who are suffering from contagious diseases and who in the interest of humanity ought to be segregated and sent to some hospital to be cured, as already provided by law, or there may be men who are seeking to violate our immigration laws, but more particularly our exclusion laws, and that is, of course, the reason for using the expression "bona fide seamen."

A remarkable fact about this bill is that it makes no effort to distinguish between bona fide and mala fide seamen. It seems to me that there can be but one reason for placing seamen outside of the immigration laws. It is intended that they shall be permitted on shore. To prevent them from coming on shore would be an inhumanity so gross that no nations prohibit shore leave except for the purpose of quarantine or in times of war. But aside from this consideration we could not hold them on board of the vessel, because they are in our harbors, within our jurisdiction, and it would be involuntary servitude and prohibited by the thirteenth amendment to our Constitution. While we might restrain those seamen in some safe place until they could be deported, it does not seem to me that we can convert those vessels into prisons in our harbors.

Section 15 of this bill, which provides for the maintenance of exempt status, is as follows:

The admission to the United States of an alien excepted from the class of immigrants by clause (2), (3) (4), (5), or (6) of section 3, or declared to be nonquota immigrants by subdivision (e) of section 4, shall be for such time as may be by regulation prescribed (including when deemed necessary for the classes mentioned in classes (2), (3), (4), or (6) of section 3, the giving of bonds with sufficient surety, in such sums and containing such conditions as may be by regulations prescribed) to insure that, at the expiration of such time or upon failure to maintain the status under which admited, he will depart from the United States.

Here we have bona fide and mala fide seamen treated alike. So far as the seamen are concerned, there may be regulations; but there are to be no bonds. The purpose of this distinction between the seamen and others is evidently that the regulations are not to be of such kind as to keep the seamen a prisoner on the vessel. So far these provisions are humane and in the best interests of the United States except that it gives to the mala fide seaman, the man who seeks to use the status of seaman to violate the immigration laws, his opportunity to escape and to thus accomplish his purpose.

The conferees must have felt that section 15 leaves an opening for vessels and mala fide seamen to violate the immigration laws, because section 19 brings all seamen under the complete domination of the immigration laws.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I asked the Senator from Pennsylvania if section 15 did not bring the seamen back under the immigration law, and he said that it did not. The Senator was correct. I made a mistake in the number of the section. I meant sections 19 and 21 instead of section 15.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. My answer to the question as changed would have been just the same.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will read section 19 as follows:

SEC. 19. No alien seaman excluded from admission into the United States under the immigration laws and employed by any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe for the ultimate departure, removal, or deportation of such alien from the United States.

The term "immigration laws" is on page 43, lines 21 to 24, defined as follows:

The term "immigration laws" include such act, this act, and all laws, conventions, and treaties of the United States, relating to immigration, exclusion, or expulsion of aliens.

Surely there must be some unconscious oversight. In section 4612 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the word "seaman" is defined as follows:

and every person (apprentices excepted) who shall be employed to serve in any capacity on board the same (vessel) shall be deemed and taken to be a "seaman."

Sections 8 and 15 exempts the seaman from the immigration laws, and he may go on shore. Section 19 places him under the immigration laws and he may not go on shore except in case of sickness for medical treatment or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe. Those regulations must, of course, be within the immigration laws, and it does not seem that he can go on shore at all unless he can qualify as an immigrant in every particular and in addition thereto has an immigration visa, which he can not obtain except in his own country.

Section 21 provides a fine of $1,000 in each case for any failure to keep the seaman on board until examined physically and otherwise, or for failure to keep on board and deport him who is not permitted to land, and finally the same fine is imposed if any seaman has deserted and is not on the vessel when she is about to depart from the port. The master will see that no one deserts if he can prevent it, unless he carried such person to our port with the purpose of violating the immigration laws.

The fine of course can not be collected unless collusion can be proved, and under such circumstances as exist in every vessel there is no chance of proving collusion. Thus it seems that the bona fide seaman is legally tied to the vessel, while the mala fide seaman, who came with the purpose of violating the immigration laws, is accomplishing this purpose.

The purpose of amending our maritime law by passing the seamen's act was—

1. To abolish involuntary servitude among seamen in so far as we could do it;
2. To encourage the American citizen to go to sea;
3. To equalize the wage cost of operating foreign and American merchant vessels.

Such equalization could only come by the seamen being liberated. Hence we abrogated such treaties and repealed such statutes as compelled the seaman to remain on the vessel on which he served when coming into our ports. It was realized that if the seaman could not obtain at least half the wages earned and not received he would be held to the vessel by his physical necessities and the purpose of the law would fail. It was for this reason that section 4 of the seamen's act was passed.

Section 4 of the seamen's act reads in part as follows:

Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive on demand from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-half part of the balance of his wages earned and remaining unpaid at the time when such demand is made at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has been commenced, shall load or deliver cargo before the voyage is ended, and all stipulations in the contract to the contrary shall be void. * * * Any failure on the part of the master to comply with this demand shall release the seaman from his contract, and he shall be entitled to full payment of wages earned. * * * And provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels while in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement.

It is difficult to see how the seaman can enforce his right under this section of the marine law if the Commissioner of Immigration or the Secretary of Labor is to enforce the immigration laws, as provided in sections 19 and 21 of this bill. Under section 21 it will require a court order to get the seaman legally out of the vessel; and if the seaman deserts, he may, under the immigration laws, be apprehended and either returned to the vessel or deported in some other vessel. The court-order method will be extremely difficult, and enforcement after desertion will be impossible.

For all practical purposes, section 4 of the seamen's act is superseded and repealed.

I do not believe that such was the intention of the conferees, and I certainly do not believe that the Senate had any such intention. This is my reason for taking up the time of the Senate with this question. When the conferees felt that section 15 left a big opening for the violation of the immigration laws, they had a complete remedy in the amendment offered in the Senate by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. At that time it was, as I understood, tentatively agreed that the "side door" should be closed in conference, and the seamen's act left intact. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah would have closed this door. I remember that on the evening the bill was sent to conference we did not insist upon a record vote, because we were assured that this door would be closed.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah made a clear distinction between bona fide and mala fide seamen. It provided for deportation, at the cost of the vessel by which they were brought, of mala fide seamen and of excluded persons coming as seamen, unless the seamen came on a vessel in distress or on a vessel of whose flag they were the proper nationals as distinct from being subject to such flag through belonging to any colony or dependency of such flag.

Subsections (e) and (f) of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah would effectively close the "side door," and do so without repealing the seamen's act or any part thereof. Before I vote for the report of the conferees, and thereby assist the foreign shipowners and others unfriendly to the development of a merchant marine and a sea power for the United States, I desire some further information as to why this amendment should not be adopted, especially since we have letters from the Commissioner of Navigation to the effect that, with a slight amendment which would be an improvement, there is nothing impractical in either of these subsections; and from the Secretary of State to the effect that there is no treaty to which such subsections are contrary and that, with a slight amendment, to which there can be no valid exception, it will not offend against any idea of comity; and also from the Secretary of Labor stating that if the bill should incorporate the amendment to which I have referred, he could see no reason why it should cause any interference with the administration of the immigration laws by the Department of Labor.

In the report of the conferees as first submitted there were provisions for photographing and fingerprinting the seamen; in other words, treating them as convicted crooks. Aside from what it did to the seamen, it purposed to burden the vessels with needless, cumbersome, time-destroying and very expensive machinery, which after all would have been ineffective. As I recall, the Senator from Utah told me this afternoon that that provision had been eliminated.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator from Utah did not say so, I think I did; it has been taken out completely.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And there is no landing card provision?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There is no landing card provision.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am of the opinion that the Senate should take action to strike out sections 19 and 21. With those sections stricken out and the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, I believe the side door will be closed, and we shall carry out what I believe was the intention of the Senate when we sent this bill to conference, when we were assured that this door would be closed.

Mr. President, I believe that I have furnished the proofs that sections 19 and 21 as embodied in the conference report repeal or at least take all practical value out of the seamen's act. If this be so, and I believe it to be so, then we shall have, at least until the courts can act, a restoration of involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen serving on board vessels within our jurisdiction; we shall have the old differential in wage cost restored and we shall lose what we now have of efficient American seamen, for all able-bodied, intelligent, efficient Americans will leave the sea unless proper protection and safeguards are afforded them. If this reversal policy is to be effectuated let it be done openly and without any equivocation. It ought not to be brought here as an illogical appendix to the immigration bill. If we are going to kill the seamen's act, let us do it openly and aboveboard. How is such reversal of policy going to appeal to the men without whom we can have no merchant marine? Prior to the passage of the seamen's act we had practically no native or citizen seamen.

So long as the seamen's act was being enforced conditions on board vessels were such that American boys would go to sea. Men who will go to sea are the only source of sea power of any nation. The sea power of a nation can not be built up when its merchant marine and its navy are manned by the nationals of other countries. If America is going to take its place among the nations of the world as a sea power, if it is worth anything to the Nation to have a Navy and to have a merchant marine, they can only be built up by manning the ships of the Navy and of the American merchant marine by American citizens, and they can only be encouraged to serve on board vessels when the conditions are such that they can maintain their self-respect.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator from Minnesota had concluded.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he had finished.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I shall finish in a very little while.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator to understand that I was trying to hurry him. That was not my purpose by any means. I thought the Senator had finished. He turned around and walked back. I certainly do not want to hurry him.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I walked back to get a pamphlet. I will assure the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Nebraska that I do not think they tried to hurry me.

Mr. President, after years of investigation and study, the seamen's act was passed. The war came. We needed loyal and courageous seamen. The Shipping Board in its reports has indicated the ease with which our efforts might have been hampered by the seamen, but it also records that there were no strikes among the seamen because "of the patriotism and sound leadership which prevailed among the men."

Mr. President, I send to the desk "A call to the sea" which was sent out by the president of the Seamen's Union of America to all men in America who had left the sea. I think the loyalty and devotion of seafaring men in the time of the Nation's crisis was of such a character that they are entitled to the protection of the country which they served well in time of war. I ask that this "Call to the sea" may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The principal clerk read as follows:

A CALL TO THE SEA

To all seafaring men ashore or afloat:

The International Seamen's Union of America, in annual convention assembled, representing the organized seamen of America, submits the following to all men of seafaring experience, ashore or afloat.

The Nation that proclaimed your freedom now needs your services. America is at war. Our troops are being transported over the seas. Munitions and supplies are being shipped in ever-increasing quantities to our Armies in Europe. The bases are the ports of America. The battle fields are in Europe. The sea intervenes. Over it the men of the sea must sail the supply ships. A great emergency fleet is now being built. Thousands of skilled seamen, seafaring men of all capacities who left the sea in years gone by as a protest against the serfdom from which no flag then offered relief, have now an opportunity to return to their former calling, sail as free men, and serve our country.

Your old shipmates—men who remained with the ship to win the new status for our craft—now call upon you to again stand by for duty. Your help is needed to prove that no enemy on the seas can stop the ships of the Nation whose seamen bear the responsibility of liberty.

America has the right—a far greater right than any other nation—to call upon the seamen of all the world for service. By responding to this call now you can demonstrate your practical appreciation of freedom won.

All men of seafaring experience can get further information on this subject by applying to any representative of the United States Shipping Board, or to any officer or representative of the International Seamen's Union of America, or any of its district organizations. It should be understood that this statement is not issued because of any real shortage of men at this time. We must be prepared, however, to man the great new merchant fleet now building. Men must be ready and in training. It is in recognition of this need that we, as a duty to the Nation, submit this call to all seamen.

INTERNATIONAL SEAMEN'S UNION OF AMERICA.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from the Acting Secretary of Labor and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The reading clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, May 1, 1924.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: In the absence of the Secretary, I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 30, inclosing printed copy of letter from the Secretary of State, in which you ask whether subdivisions E and F of Secretary Hughes's letter can be added to section 19 of H. R. 7995.

We have given section 19 and the proposed amendments careful consideration, and this department is of the opinion that if this section and the proposed amendments, with corrections as suggested by Secretary Hughes, are adopted it will go far toward solving many of the difficulties with which this department has been confronted in its efforts successfully to cope with the seamen's situation as it pertains to the enforcement of the immigration laws. This being true, the proposed amendments meet with the approval of this department and are highly desirable from an administrative standpoint.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

ROBE CARL WHITE,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I will say that that letter refers to the amendment that was proposed by the Senator from Utah, which I maintain would have closed this door.

I also send to the desk a letter from the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, and a letter from the commissioner of navigation of the Department of Commerce, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD without being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 24, 1924.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: I have received your letter of April 23 asking whether, in my opinion, subdivisions (e) and (f) of the proposed amendment of section 19 of the pending immigration bill, H. R. 7995, would be in conflict with any treaty now existing between the United States and a foreign country. The proposed provisions are as follows:

"(e) All vessels entering ports of the United States manned with crews, the majority of which, exclusive of licensed officers, have been engaged and taken on at foreign ports shall, when departing from the United States ports, carry a crew of at least equal number, and any such vessel which fails to comply with this requirement shall be refused clearance.

"(f) No vessel shall, unless such vessel is in distress, bring into a port of the United States as a member of her crew any alien who, if he were applying for admission to the United States as an immigrant, would be subject to exclusion under paragraph (b) of section 12 hereof; except that any ship of the merchant marine of any one of the countries, islands, dependencies, or colonies, immigrants coming from which are excluded by the said provisions of law, shall be permitted to enter ports of the United States having on board in their crews aliens of said description who are natives of the particular country, island, dependency, or colony to the merchant marine of which such vessel belongs. Any alien seaman brought into a port of the United States in violation of this provision shall be excluded from admission or temporary landing and shall be deported either to the place of shipment or to the country of his nativity, as a passenger, on a vessel other than that on which brought, at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and the vessel by which brought shall not be granted clearance until such expenses are paid or their payment satisfactorily guaranteed."

Probably the countries which would be affected most by the proposed measures would be Great Britain, Japan, and the Netherlands.

I do not find anything in the treaty of commerce and navigation of 1852 with the Netherlands which seems to have any direct bearing upon this question.

Article I of the convention of commerce and navigation of 1815 with Great Britain reads as follows:

"There shall be between the territories of the United States of America and all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers, in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively; also to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively."

Article I of the treaty of commerce and navigation of 1911 with Japan reads, in part, as follows:

"The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel, and reside in the territories of the other, to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses, and ships, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established."

Article IV of the same treaty reads as follows:

"There shall be between the territories of the two high contracting parties reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation. The citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties, equally with the citizens or subjects of the most-favored nation, shall have liberty freely to come with their ships and cargoes to all places, ports, and rivers in the territories of the other which are or may be opened to foreign commerce, subject always to the laws of the country to which they thus come."

Provisions more or less similar to those quoted may be found in treaties with other countries.

Especial attention is called to the provisions in the treaties from which I have quoted relating to "reciprocal liberty of commerce" and "reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation." It appears to me that subdivision (e) of the proposed amendment of section 19 might operate in such a way as to interfere with reciprocal freedom or liberty of commerce and to cause serious loss to British and Japanese vessels, and perhaps vessels of other countries with which the United States has commercial treaties similar to those from which I have quoted. If, for example, a seaman on a vessel coming within the provisions of subdivision (e) should die or become ill and have to be taken to a hospital, or if one or more members of the crew should desert, immediately before the scheduled time for sailing, it is quite possible that a considerable time would be required to obtain other seamen to fill their places. It is quite conceivable that a delay of several hours or of a day or more might be required to fill the quota of the crew. In the case of a large vessel a delay of an hour or more may result in a very large loss. Therefore, if the proposed provision should be adopted, it would seem desirable to amend it in such a way as to make it less rigid. Perhaps this might be done by adding a provision to the effect that the Secretary of the Treasury should have authority to give the vessel clearance where the crew loss has occurred within a specified time before the scheduled time for sailing and where such loss has not been caused by the fault of the vessel. You may wish to consult with the Secretary of the Treasury concerning this point.

As to subdivision (f), there would seem to be no conflict with commercial treaties except, perhaps, in so far as it applies to seamen subject to exclusion under the immigration act as being ineligible to naturalization and coming from overseas dominions or colonies of the country to which the vessel belongs. This objection would not be apt to arise under the convention of commerce and navigation of 1815 between the United States and Great Britain, since that convention specifically applies to commerce between the territories of the United States of America and "all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe." However, the British Government might object upon the ground that the provision as applied to Hindoos serving in British vessels plying between the United States and India would be so unreasonable as to amount to a violation of international comity. The Japanese Government might object upon the ground that the application of this provision to Korean seamen serving on Japanese vessels would be a violation of the provisions of Articles I to IV of the treaty of commerce and navigation of 1911, quoted above. The Japanese Government might reasonably contend that the treaty provisions just mentioned guarantee the right of Japanese subjects, whether coming from Japan proper or from overseas dominions, to come to the United States for purposes of commerce and navigation, and that these provisions cover the seamen on a vessel as well as its owners and agents.

For the reasons mentioned above, it would seem desirable to have subdivision (f) amended in such a way as to avoid its application to seamen of the class mentioned coming from outlying dominions.

I am, my dear Mr. RAKER,

Sincerely yours, CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, April 23, 1924.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. RAKER: I have received your letter of the 22d instant inclosing proposed amendments of sections 18 and 19 of immigration bill H. R. 7995. You inquire as to the bureau's opinion whether these amendments are in contravention of the seamen's act of March 4, 1915; whether they are contrary to any treaties existing between the United States and any foreign governments; and whether they are in contravention of the "law of the sea."

As I understand the proposed amendments, they are not in contravention of the seamen's act of March 4, 1915.

Whether these proposed amendments are in contravention of treaties of the United States appears to be for the consideration of the Department of State, and this bureau does not feel justified in going into that question.

The proposed addition at the end of line 11, page 25, to the effect that the immigration authorities may remove from vessels, foreign and American, any member of the crew found not to be a bona fide seaman in the opinion of the immigration officer, goes much further than any maritime law or practice with which this bureau is familiar.

The amendment which follows, identified as (e), does not appear to be in contravention of any of our navigation laws unless possibly it is contrary to the spirit of section 4400, Revised Statutes, which provides, in effect, that the United States is not to fix the number of crew which a foreign vessel shall carry, inasmuch as section 4400 does not make 4463, Revised Statutes, as amended, applicable to foreign vessels. The bureau has not before it the law of any other maritime nation containing a similar requirement.

The amendment identified as (f), prohibiting any vessel bringing into a port of the United States an ineligible alien as a member of her crew, with enumerated exceptions, extends much further than any legislation of any maritime country with which this bureau is familiar.

In making the above statements this bureau wishes it clearly understood that it is not in any sense approving or disapproving the amendments or endeavoring in any way to pass on the merits of such proposals.

Respectfully, D. B. CARSON, Commissioner.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I will say in conclusion that in my opinion the report of the conference committee ought to be sent back and that the conferees ought to be instructed to bring back a bill complying with the intention of the Senate.

I move, Mr. President, that the bill be sent back to conference and that the conferees be instructed to bring back——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a point of order. I make the point of order that the pending motion is to agree to the conference report, and that no motion is in order unless it would have the effect of bringing about a prompter concurrence between the Houses than would the adoption of the present motion, and therefore that the motion of the Senator from Minnesota is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand the Chair to hold that a motion to recommit with instructions to conferees to insist upon incorporating within the bill certain provisions to which the Senator has referred—namely, an amendment offered by a Senator when the bill was under consideration—is not proper at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of that impression.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, simply on the point of order, I think the order of motions in regard to conference reports is very well settled. It is based, of course, on the proposition that that motion which most quickly brings the Houses together is first in order; and if a motion to agree to a report is made, that motion must be first disposed of before any other can be made.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question? Here is a conference report. Does the vote come on the adoption of the conference report or the rejection of it?

Mr. LODGE. It must come first on the motion to agree to the report. That has been held here several times.

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say, before I propound the parliamentary inquiry, that my impression is that it is necessary to vote the report up or down——

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. And that no motion to recommit with instructions is in order; but if a motion to recommit is in order, I desire to amend the motion to recommit with instructions touching this other phase of the proposition. It is my impression, however, that it is necessary to vote the report either up or down.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair, and the Chair has so ruled.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, so far as the parliamentary situation is concerned, it seems to me there can be no controversy. The principle that underlies conference reports, so far as preference of motions is concerned, is always to give preference to that motion which will soonest bring the two Houses together. The motion pending before the Senate is to agree to the conference report. If that motion prevails, of course it brings them absolutely together. There could be no motion made that would do it more effectively than that. If the motion to agree to the conference report should be defeated, then these other motions would be in order.

I did not expect to talk about the parliamentary situation; but, Mr. President, I have been unable for want of time to give any detailed consideration to some of the legislation that is very important and in which I have a deep interest. The immigration bill is one of those measures. I always feel, however, a jealous regard for the seamen's act. That law was put on the statute books after a great deal of discussion, lasting quite a good many years, and upon which honest men disagreed; but finally we put that law on the statute books. I do not want, myself, to do anything that will change that law, unless it be to improve it. I was a believer in it when it passed, and I have always believed in it since.

I regret that I am not able, with the light I have and the study I have been able to make in the limited time I have had to devote to it, to satisfy myself as to just what is the proper thing to do in regard to this conference report. I voted for the immigration bill, and, with the exception of the matter that is in controversy here, I believe in it. I believe particularly in that part of the conference report which has brought to an end the so-called exclusion controversy. I do not want to do anything that would delay the consummation of a law of that kind.

I listened to the explanation made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] in regard to the so-called seamen's act, and it seemed to me that he made a fair explanation of it. It was fairly satisfactory to me. I have listened to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. I have been very greatly impressed with what he has said, because he has evidently studied the matter and knows much more about the particular controversy than I do. I have been acquainted with Mr. Andrew Furuseth for a good many years, and I want to say for him that of all the men I have come in contact with who are watching legislation for various organizations and various interests there is not a single man that I have met in any capacity of that kind in whom I have greater confidence than I have in Andrew Furuseth. I would be willing to take his word on almost anything that I had not an opportunity myself to study out and solve satisfactorily to myself. I do not believe that he is capable of trying to mislead any honest man, or that he is ever actuated by a dishonest motive.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator did not understand, from anything I said, that I differed with him in that, I hope.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I believe, with the Senator, that Mr. Furuseth tells the exact and literal truth as he sees it, whether it is for him or against him.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We can depend on his statements of fact, but I can not yield to him when it comes to the mere matter of construction of a statute.

Mr. NORRIS. Neither could I yield to him if I had had an opportunity to study the matter, as the Senator has, and had reached a different conclusion from Mr. Furuseth. I would follow mine. I am confronted here, however, with a condition where I have not been able to take up the controversy myself and go through it. It has been a physical impossibility for me to do it, as I presume it has for other Senators who have been engaged in other work.

When we passed the immigration bill, although the amendment of the Senator from Utah was not put on it, I thought that the whole thing would be satisfactorily arranged in conference. According to the idea of the Senator from Pennsylvania—and I have great respect for his opinion on the subject, and he has given it much study—that has been done. It seems that there is still a disagreement, however, as to whether the adoption of this conference report would not have the effect of putting some loopholes in the seamen's act.

I say this to those who believe in the restriction of immigration: They are equally interested, I think, in seeing that nothing is done with the seamen's act that will permit owners of foreign ships unlawfully to bring in here immigrants that our law intends to exclude. We all agree to that, of course. The Senator from Pennsylvania does, the same as the rest of us. Whether or not there is such a loophole is in dispute. If I thought this conference report could go back to the conferees and that there would not be any doubt but that we could get another conference report here that would relieve the question of all doubt, I would not hesitate to vote to send it back, although my motive might be misconstrued if I did not express my ideas on it. Outside of that, I should like to approve this conference report.

I do not agree with some of the Senators who object to it because, for instance, some had been put outside of the quota whom they would put in. Most of those I would rather have inside of the quota than out, but we will have to concede something to the other House. We can not get all we want, probably, and we will have to compromise. As far as a citizen of the United States whose wife is an alien and who is abroad is concerned, I believe I would prefer that that exception be outside of the quota, because that is a plain instance where, it seems to me, the wife ought to be admitted, regardless of all conditions and of all circumstances. The idea of passing an immigration law that will separate families and break home ties is simply heartbreaking, and no man can afford to stand for it. I have no objection to the conference report, therefore, on that ground. It will admit a few more, but it will admit only those who ought to come in anyway.

I wanted to say this much, Mr. President, because I did not want to be misunderstood. I do not want to see the seamen's act injured. I do not want to see a loophole left by which persons can come in illegally. I was rather impressed, when the Senator from Pennsylvania outlined the dispute with Mr. Furuseth as to the effect of this conference report on the bill, that the Senator from Pennsylvania was right in his construction. I do not understand, however, why some of these simple amendments which have been suggested by the Secretary of Labor have not been included in the conference report.

I have not been able to be here all the time this debate has been going on. I have been called out two or three times, and knowing the interest which the junior Senator from Utah has taken in this matter, I would like to hear from the Senator from Utah as to his construction of that disagreement between the Senator from Pennsylvania and Mr. Furuseth as to the possibilities or the probabilities of this measure, as it now stands in the conference report, being used for the purpose of bringing in illegally some immigrants, and what change, if any, has been made in the seamen's act. I would like to know what he thinks with regard to the measure as it stands now in the conference report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that I am not able to give a satisfactory reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I did not anticipate the conference report would be presented to the Senate for action until to-morrow, and I hoped to have had an opportunity to examine the legal questions now raised and brought to my attention for the first time in a sharp and definite manner this morning, in connection with the provisions of the reported bill dealing with seamen. As the Senator knows, when the bill was before the Senate, I offered an amendment which would have dealt in a comprehensive, and I think effective manner with the question of aliens as that question is linked with seamen. It effectually closed the doors which now are surreptitiously opened and through which persons ineligible to citizenship or to entrance into the United States reach our shores. It was a proper complement to the immigration law to be integrated with the seamen's act.

The Senate, however, rejected the amendment which I offered, so that when the Senate bill went to conference, there were no provisions within it dealing with this question. The House bill, however, had a number of provisions dealing with seamen, but some of them were objectionable and were not accepted. I suggested in the conference—and I hope that I am not violating the proprieties in referring to the action of the conferees—that the amendment which the Senate had rejected, or some other suitable provision, be made a part of the measure agreed upon in conference. However, my suggestion was not accepted.

The House provisions were modified, and as modified appear in the conference report. I can say to the Senator from Nebraska that it was the opinion of the conferees who accepted the final draft that it did not impinge upon the seamen's act and would not be construed as in any manner contravening either the letter or spirit of the same. However, I have not had time to examine this question as fully as I should like. I did not approve of the conference report and declined to sign it. One of the reasons which prompted me to withhold my signature was my feeling that we had not handled the immigration question as it was allied to seamen in as effective and satisfactory a manner as it should have been dealt with. I believed that the accepted provisions now found in the conference report would not accomplish what was desired in the exclusion of persons from our shores who, either as seamen or as immigrants, were not permitted to land.

I regret that the measure before us has not covered this important subject, as I believe it should have been dealt with. There was no thought when the provisions were agreed upon in conference that it could possibly be interpreted as affecting the seamen's act, and, as stated, not until to-day was my attention sharply challenged to this matter.

Mr. Furuseth feels that it does modify provisions of the seamen's act, and he takes the position, with great vigor, that it leaves the side door open, as a result of which persons who are excluded from admission to our shores will be enabled to enter the United States. He also feels that it will modify the present law and impose restrictions upon certain persons, which will illegally interfere with their freedom. One of the House conferees with whom I have just spoken, and who has given a great deal of attention to this matter, states that the interpretation placed by Mr. Furuseth upon the conference report will not be the one adopted by the departments or by the courts, and that there need be no concern upon the ground that it may modify or emasculate, in any manner, the seamen's act.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If this conference report were rejected and went back to conference, and everybody understood that it went back just on this one provision alone, would the House conferees, in the Senator's judgment, feel as I think the Senate conferees would feel, that the only object was to remedy what may be a defect in this one particular about the seamen's act, and that if there is any defect, they would like to remedy it? In other words, would there be any real controversy with the House conferees?

Mr. KING. My opinion after having spoken to-day with one of the House conferees, and from the general discussion when the matter was before us in conference, is that if the bill were sent back to conference no change would be made in this provision. By that I mean that a majority of the conferees, I believe, would take the same position that they now take, namely, that the provisions agreed upon in conference are not in conflict in any possible way with the seamen's act. If the conference report could be recommitted and more effective and suitable provisions accepted, I should be glad. It would gratify me if the bill could be recommitted for the purpose of having the amendment which I offered in the Senate substituted for the provisions dealing with alien seamen now appearing in the conference report. Candor, however, compels me to state to the Senator that I do not believe the conferees would accept my amendment or any amendment or provision of similar import.

Mr. President, I am disappointed in the measure which will soon receive the approval of the Senate and which has already obtained the seal of approval by the House. I was in favor of restricting immigration and as a member of the Immigration Committee endeavored as best I could to aid in framing a bill that would be fair and would protect the interests of our country and deal fairly and justly with the various peoples who were to be admitted to our shores. The pending bill is discriminatory against certain nationalities. It has perpetuated a view with respect to the races of Europe which I do not regard as sound and which should not be the basis of national legislation. It is believed by nations of southern and southeastern Europe that it is discriminatory, and the provision of the bill which bases quotas for immigration after the year 1927 upon national origins confirms this view which is so widely entertained. However, the necessity for legislation dealing with the subject of immigration is conceded by all, and this bill will undoubtedly be approved by a great majority of the American people. It has many admirable features and much of which I cordially approve. With a few amendments, I could give it my hearty approval.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON (when Mr. COPELAND's name was called). The junior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. If the junior Senator from New York were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. LENROOT's name was called). The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. As he has already voted for the bill, and I know would vote as I intend to vote, I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON. The junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BROUSSARD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who would vote "yea" if present. Therefore I permit my vote to stand.

Mr. FESS (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRIS], with whom I am paired, is unavoidably absent. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." Therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] is paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 69, nays 9, as follows:

So the report was agreed to.

POSTHUMOUS APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS OF CERTAIN PERSONS IN THE ARMY

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, during the war a number of our brave soldiers were killed in battle or died. In many cases their commissions had been sent to them or they had been recommended for promotion; but under the law, inasmuch as they had not accepted, they could not be given the rank which it was intended they should have. I have prepared a joint resolution providing that all of these boys shall be placed on the rolls in the grade and at the rank to which they were appointed or for which they were recommended by the War Department, including some whose commissions were not received at all.

Sections 1 and 2 of my resolution to provide for the posthumous appointment to commissioned grades of certain enlisted men and the posthumous promotion of certain commissioned officers are substantially the same as sections 2 and 3 of Senate Joint Resolution No. 28 of the Sixty-seventh Congress, which passed the Senate January 23, 1922, and the latter resolution is identical with Senate Joint Resolution No. 70, of the Sixty-sixth Congress, which passed the Senate August 2, 1919.

The slight changes in the wording of my resolution were made in conformity with the recommendation of the Secretary of War in letter addressed to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, March 25, 1922, while that committee was considering Senate Joint Resolution No. 28. These changes in no way alter the meaning or the intent of the original resolutions as they passed the Senate.

The Senate has thus on two occasions, once during the Sixty-sixth and once during the Sixty-seventh Congress, approved these two sections (1 and 2) of my resolution, and the War Department has formally recommended them.

Section 3 of my resolution is substantially the same as section 5 of House Joint Resolution No. 105, Sixty-seventh Congress, the first four sections of which were identical with Senate Joint Resolution No. 28 of that Congress, which, as I have already stated, passed the Senate January 23, 1922. The fifth section of the House resolution, from which my section 3 is taken, was added upon recommendation of the Secretary of War in letter to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, dated April 27, 1921, in which Secretary Weeks renewed a recommendation made by his predecessor in letter of October 29, 1919. The slight changes I have made in the wording of this section conform to the recommendation of the Secretary of War in letter to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, dated March 25, 1922.

None of these resolutions was ever reported out by the House Committee on Military Affairs, due, I am informed, to objections to sections 1 and 4, both of which have been omitted in my resolution. So far as I am aware, no opposition was voiced to any one of the three sections of the resolution I have introduced, and they are so manifestly appropriate and just, though belated, that I can not conceive of anyone objecting to them.

Briefly, sections 1 and 2 of my resolution provide for the posthumous appointment of soldiers to commissioned grades and promotion of commissioned officers who were killed in action or died in line of duty during the World War after their appointment or promotion to the advanced grade had been duly approved but before official notice thereof or the commissions could reach them. The final step necessary in all appointments and promotions—that is, the formal acceptance of the commission—is therefore lacking, and under a decision of the Supreme Court the men's names can not be carried on the records of the War Department in the advanced grades. To perfect these appointments and promotions, earned in most cases by meritorious and distinguished service on the field of battle, and to provide for the issuance of appropriate commission in the names of the deceased is the purpose of this resolution. The resolution carries no increase of pay; in fact, such increase is specifically prohibited by section 4.

In the case of Brig. Gen. Edward Sigerfoos, who while serving as a colonel was killed in action on October 7, 1918, three days after his nomination by the President for appointment as brigadier general, the Congress by special act approved April 12, 1920, directed that he should thereafter be held and considered to have become a brigadier general and to have held that office until the date of his death. The act also provided for the issuance of a commission as brigadier general in his name.

No doubt special acts would have been passed in behalf of others had not the general resolutions I have mentioned covering all similar cases been pending before Congress.

I myself would have introduced and strongly urged the passage of a bill to promote the late First Lieut. Henry M. Atkinson, jr., whose commission as captain reached his regiment in France the very day of his death.

Lieutenant Atkinson was the only son on one of the most prominent and influential men of my State. Few men have done as much as he has for the development of our section. Lieutenant Atkinson was himself the highest type of young American manhood. He was given the very best educational advantages this country affords, and he made good use of them.

As a boy he attended the Peacock School and Marist College in Atlanta. He spent six years at Groton School and four at Harvard College, receiving his degree of bachelor of arts at the latter in 1915. He then went to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to pursue a graduate course in electrical engineering to prepare himself to assist his father in his profession. It was the latter's intention gradually to turn over to his son his extensive business interests in order that he might later retire and enjoy a well-earned rest.

Realizing that he might have occasion to serve his country on the field of battle, young Atkinson attended a military school as a boy, and while at Harvard University he served one three-year enlistment in the Massachusetts Volunteer Militia. The character of "Excellent" on his discharge from the latter attests the deep interest taken by him in his military training.

Mr. Atkinson was among the first to volunteer for service after our declaration of war with Germany. He was sent to the first officers' training camp, and upon completion of the course was offered a commission as captain in the Officers' Reserve Corps. He, however, declined this offer and accepted a commission in a lower grade—lieutenant—in the Regular Army, feeling that he might thereby be amongst the first to reach the battle front in France.

Lieutenant Atkinson served with credit and distinction until nine days before the armistice, when he succumbed to an attack of bronchial pneumonia during that terrible epidemic of influenza which took away so many of our patriotic and brave soldiers in France, as well as in our concentration camps at home. I have already stated that his commission as captain, which he had earned on the field of battle, reached his regiment the very day of his death, too late for him to sign his letter of acceptance.

Not realizing that acceptance of the commission was essential to perfect his promotion, the regiment buried him as a captain and placed the title of captain before his name on the white cross that marked his temporary resting place in France.

Nearly four years later, in the summer of 1922, the bereaved father and mother made a pilgrimage to far-off France to be present at the final interment of their son in the national cemetery near Fere-en-Tardenois, one of the six large American cemeteries in France, to which were transferred the bodies of our brave officers and soldiers that were not to be brought back to the homeland.

Upon arrival in Paris the father was informed by the officer in charge of the American graves registration service that instructions had just been received from the War Department to change the rank from captain to first lieutenant on the white cross that was to be placed at the new grave of his son. It is not difficult to imagine the pain this information caused the disconsolate mother who had made the long journey from her home in America to pay tribute to the memory of her beloved son and hero. She felt that her boy was being demoted by an ungrateful Government after he had made the supreme sacrifice for his country and humanity.

Fortunately the instructions to change the rank on the cross were not transmitted immediately from the headquarters in Paris to the officer in charge of the cemetery, so the parents had the satisfaction of seeing the title of captain before their son's name on the white cross when they reached the cemetery the following day.

Later the War Department authorized the retention of the higher rank on the crosses in the cases of Captain Atkinson and others whose death prevented them from accepting commissions forwarded to their commands.

No doubt the War Department was influenced by the knowledge that there was then pending before Congress a joint resolution, which had twice passed the Senate, providing for the promotion of these officers who had sacrificed their lives for their country, and it is more than probable that the department felt reasonably sure this meritorious provision would soon become law.

This commendable act of the War Department brought comfort to the bereaved parents, widows, and other relatives and friends of the fallen heroes, but the department is without authority of law to take the next step and change its own records to show the appointments and promotions to the higher grades.

We thus have one rank or title before the names of these officers on the headstones or white crosses that mark their last resting places and another and lower rank on the records of the War Department. To correct this anomaly and posthumously confer upon these officers the rank which they earned on the field of battle would be a simple act of justice and would show that their Government has not entirely forgotten the sacrifices they made in its defense.

There is another case, Mr. President, with which I happen to be familiar, that would no doubt have received special consideration by the Congress had there been any fear of unfavorable action upon the pending general legislation now incorporated in my resolution.

It is the case of First Lieut. Thurston Elmer Wood, Twelfth United States Field Artillery, a brave and gallant young officer, who was killed in action in France on July 21, 1918. For extraordinary heroism displayed by him in the battle in which he sacrificed his life, Lieutenant Wood was posthumously awarded the Croix de Guerre with silver star by the French Government, the citation stating that—

He displayed coolness and contempt of danger in going, under a violent bombardment, to the rescue of a wounded driver of his section.

Lieutenant Wood, the son of a distinguished officer of the Navy, Capt. Albert N. Wood, was graduated from the United States Military Academy on August 30, 1917, and served with credit and distinction until he was killed on the field of battle. In recognition of his efficient and meritorious service in France, Lieutenant Wood had been recommended for promotion to the grade of captain and his promotion had been duly approved, but he was cut down by the enemy's projectile before he could accept the commission in the higher grade.

Mr. President, I have explained in detail the case of Lieutenant or Captain Atkinson, and briefly that of Lieutenant Wood, to show there is need for congressional action even at this late date. No doubt there are many other similar cases that have been brought to the attention of Members of this body, and we shall be derelict in our duty if we fail before the end of this session of Congress to authorize the War Department to issue the appropriate commissions and make the necessary corrections in the records of the officers concerned.

The purpose and intent of section 3 of my resolution is set forth in letters of the Secretary of War to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, dated October 29, 1919, and April 27, 1921, and to the chairman Senate Committee on Military Affairs, dated May 10, 1921.

I quote from the letter to the chairman of the Senate committee:

The reason for the suggested addition is that a number of officers of the Regular Army have died after they had been examined and found qualified for promotion and after a vacancy had occurred to which they were entitled to be promoted but before they had been able to accept their commissions. In the case of one of these officers, Maj. John T. Haines, a special act (Private, No. 168, Sixty-third Congress, approved February 17, 1915) awarded the rank to which he would have been entitled had he lived to accept his commission. It appears to be appropriate and desirable that legislation should be enacted to cover all future cases of this nature, thus rendering unnecessary such special legislation as was enacted in the case of Major Haines.

In addition to the case of Major Haines, referred to in letter of the Secretary of War, the Congress by special act (Private No. 142, 64th Cong., approved August 29, 1916) posthumously promoted Maj. Matthew C. Butler, jr., who was brutally murdered in cold blood on July 20, 1916, six days after his nomination for promotion to the grade of lieutenant colonel had been confirmed by the Senate.

I might add that Lieutenant Colonel Butler, who had an honorable record of 33 years' service in the Army, was the son of the late United States Senator Matthew C. Butler, of South Carolina, a gallant and distinguished Confederate general.

These Regular Army cases covered by section 3 of my resolution are of rare occurrence, though I happen to know of one other case, that of First Lieut. Ralph H. Countryman, a veteran of the World War, who was drowned on December 4, 1920, after he had stood his examination for promotion. No special act has been passed awarding him the rank of captain, to which he would have been entitled had he lived to accept his commission, as was done in the cases of Major Haines and Major Butler.

My resolution covers the case of Lieutenant Countryman and all other similar cases that have occurred in the Regular Army since our declaration of war with Germany, as well as those that may occur in the future.

The fourth and last section of my resolution specifically provides that no person shall receive any bonus, gratuity, pay, or allowances by virtue of any provision of the resolution, thus removing any possible objection that might be urged against the action contemplated.

The sole purpose of my resolution is to do justice to the memory of a comparatively few officers who have died, or may hereafter die, in the service of their country before being able to accept commissions due them. This consideration by the Congress will afford some measure of comfort to the bereaved widows and parents of the officers, and will entail no expense to the Government.

As I have already stated, the Senate has twice passed resolutions embodying sections 1 and 2, and the Secretary of War has on at least three separate occasions formally recommended all the sections of my resolution.

I trust the Committee on Military Affairs, to which I assume the joint resolution will be referred, will be able to give it early consideration, and will report it back to the Senate without delay, in order that final action may be taken before the end of this session of Congress.

I introduce the joint resolution and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) to provide for the posthumous appointment to commissioned grades of certain enlisted men and the posthumous promotion of certain commissioned officers, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) to provide for the posthumous appointment to commissioned grades of certain enlisted men and the posthumous promotion of certain commissioned officers

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue or cause to be issued an appropriate commission in the name of any person who, while in the military service of the United States during the war between the United States and Germany and Austria-Hungary, had been duly appointed to a commissioned grade and, through no fault of his own, was unable to accept such commission by reason of his death in line of duty; and any such commission shall issue as of the date of such appointment, and any such person's name shall be carried upon the records of the War Department as of the grade and branch of the service to which he would have been promoted by such commission from the date of such appointment to the date of his death.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue, or cause to be issued, an appropriate commission in the name of any person who, while in the military service of the United States during the war between the United States and Germany and Austria-Hungary, may have been officially recommended for promotion to a commissioned grade, which recommendation shall have been duly approved by the Secretary of War, or by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, as the case may be, and who shall have been unable to receive and accept such commission by reason of his death in line of duty; and any such commission shall issue as of the date of such approval, and any such person's name shall be carried upon the records of the War Department as of the grade and branch of the service to which he would have been promoted by such commission, from the date of such approval to the date of his death.

SEC. 3. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue, or cause to be issued, an appropriate commission in the name of any former officer of the Regular Army of the United States who, after having been examined and found duly qualified for promotion, died since April 6, 1917, or shall die, in line of duty after the occurrence of the vacancy entitling him, by virtue of seniority, to such promotion and before the issue or acceptance of a commission therefor; and any such commission shall issue with rank as of the date of said vacancy, and any such officer's name shall be carried upon the records of the War Department as of the grade and branch of the service shown in such commission, from the date of such vacancy to the date of his death.

SEC. 4. That no person shall be entitled to receive any bonus, gratuity, pay, or allowances by virtue of any provision of this resolution.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST AMERICAN SHIPPING

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to take a moment of the time of the Senate in reference to a matter other than that now before the Senate. I am not always in agreement with editorials which are published in the Washington Post, but there was one published in that newspaper this morning which is of such vast importance to the people of this country, and should be to Congress, that I am going to take the liberty of reading it and thereby calling the attention of the Senate to it. The editorial to which I refer is headed "Discrimination against America," and reads as follows:

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST AMERICA

The chairman of the United States Shipping Board has called attention to the lack of teamwork between American railroads and shipping lines, resulting in the capture of an enormous tonnage of American exports by foreign shipping lines. Some of the railroads have made long-time contracts with foreign shipping interests which have diverted to foreign bottoms the freight that should be carried by American vessels. It is stated that two railroads recently delivered over 70,000 tons to Japanese lines, while American competing lines obtained only 4,000 tons. Yet the American lines offer equally good rates and service, and are ready to deliver freight at points desired.

This discrimination in favor of foreign ships has caused a shortage of freight for the 366 Government-owned vessels now operated, besides making it impossible to operate nearly 900 vessels that could be employed to advantage if freight were available.

At the same time the railroads are putting up a poor mouth and asking for favors from the Government.

Jobbers and exporters are also held accountable for diverting traffic to foreign ships. Cooperation among American interests seems to be entirely lacking.

This situation deserves the attention of Congress in connection with Shipping Board and railroad legislation. There is no good reason why the United States should not apply such measures as will compel cooperation in behalf of American shipping. Foreign governments do not fail to foster their merchant marine, both for the sake of commercial profit and for the upkeep of fleets that are indispensable to their national defense.

The factor of national defense in maintaining the merchant marine is not ignored by any great maritime power other than the United States. Although the ships controlled by the Shipping Board were built for the national defense, the end of the war seems to have marked the end of all concern as to the maintenance of these vessels as adjuncts of defense. Another war would require the rapid expansion and adaptation of the merchant marine to defense purposes. If the merchant marine could be safely dealt with as an exclusively commercial problem during peace times, the country would not pay much attention to the discrimination in favor of foreign ships so long as cargoes were carried cheaply. That was the situation before the war. But the war taught a costly lesson that the American people need not learn twice. It taught the people that a modern war is fought with all weapons available, and that merchant ships are most powerful weapons of offense as well as defense. The transportation of armed forces, munitions, and war materials is but a part of the duty performed by merchant vessels during war. They are indispensable as carriers of raw materials, foodstuffs, and other necessaries which must be obtained in spite of the enemy. The ravages of the submarine upon merchant shipping nearly lost the war to the Allies, notwithstanding their strength on the battle line. American destroyer convoys checkmated the submarines, but the need of merchant shipping was just as urgent as before. If the United States had not built merchant ships the war would have been lost.

Now that the ships are in existence it is the plain duty of the Government to maintain them and to replace them as they drop out of commission. The cost of maintaining the fleet solely for national defense, waiting for a war that may not come for many years, is not only prohibitive, but unnecessary extravagance. The ships can be employed for commerce, and the commerce exists with which to support them.

Foreign governments are skillful managers of ocean shipping. Their energies extend over the earth, and competition sharpens their wits. The two large Japanese lines that are getting the lion's share of American freight bound for the Orient are strongly backed by their Government, while the American lines on the Pacific are deprived of American freight and the United States Government does nothing to keep this freight in American hands. Consequently ship operators are discouraged, and it is with great difficulty that the Shipping Board keeps its vessels operating.

The United States has no quarrel with foreign governments or foreign ship lines. If they can take American freight away from Americans, they are not to be blamed. They are merely exercising the skill, persistence, and teamwork that should be exercised by the United States and its citizens. Americans should not overlook the fact that this foreign activity tends to build up merchant marines, which in time of war would be dangerous weapons in the hands of the enemy. At the same time, superior foreign tactics in capturing American freight increase the difficulty and expense of maintaining an American marine that would be adequate for the national defense.

While present conditions exist, American citizens are placed in the position of contributing to the upkeep of foreign naval power while destroying their own. Naval power is not to be reckoned only in battleships. It includes merchant vessels also. This fact was mentioned by Assistant Secretary Roosevelt in his recent able letter to Chairman BUTLER of the House Committee on Naval Affairs. Statesmanship requires full consideration of the part played by the merchant marine in national defense. For this reason, as well as for others, Senator KING's proposed thorough inquiry into the state of the United States Navy should be ordered by Congress before adjournment.

Mr. President, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, I wish to commend this well-thought out, well-considered advice to Congress, for that is what it is, or what it should be. There is no harshness about it, but it looks at the question in a businesslike way. We have 366 merchant ships in operation, and some 900 are tied up because of the lack of cargoes. There is ample freight in this country to keep them all employed, and merely by cooperation, by bringing about a state of mutual helpfulness between our railroads and our merchant marine, virtually all the wealth of the maritime western world could be brought into the hands of our merchant marine. We are justly entitled to transport the largest share of the freight pertaining to America, but we are disregarding and overlooking the opportunities that are ours. I hope that the commerce committee will take this matter up at the earliest possible moment and bring to a successful conclusion the effort to prevent such discriminations against American shipping as are set forth in the editorial which I have read.

We should not be unfair to our railroads nor should we permit them to be unfair to our merchant marine. They should be willing to cooperate with American shipping, and Congress should arrange terms on which they could cooperate to their own advantage and also to the advantage of our merchant marine. I wish most heartily to commend the statement which Chairman O'CONNOR has given out on this subject and also heartily to commend the editorial expression on this subject which I have quoted.

Mr. PITTMAN. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I merely wish to say that the editorial which the Senator has read is very timely. While we are endeavoring to build up the merchant marine, the Interstate Commerce Commission is considering the applications of western railroads for competitive rates to Pacific coast points, which applications they will be compelled to grant if they shall follow their prior decisions. At the same time the Shipping Board has passed a resolution stating that if those rates shall be granted under a departure from the fourth section of the transportation act which we have been considering, it will destroy the coastwise trade.

Mr. McKELLAR. What the Senator from Nevada has so well said I indorse. Surely, steps must be taken by Congress to prevent this destruction of the business which properly belongs to our merchant marine, and that is what would certainly happen if such a condition were allowed to exist.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, we have now only five minutes remaining before we shall take a recess. We can not accomplish anything on the pending bill during the next few minutes, and I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], if he will not request that the bill be temporarily laid aside in order that I may secure action upon a local measure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection, Mr. President, to the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside, and I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business, being the War Department appropriation bill? The Chair hears none, and that bill is temporarily laid aside.

GASPARILLA ISLAND MILITARY RESERVATION

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, the bill (S. 3211) authorizing the sale of Gasparilla Island Military Reservation, and I submit a report (No. 549) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill named by him, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill has reference to the sale of a military reservation in Florida which is no longer needed for military purposes. The report is made in accordance with the recommendation of the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio desire that the bill shall be read for information?

Mr. WILLIS. Let the report be read, if it is not too long.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have reported the bill precisely as the War Department has prepared it. The War Department prepared a substitute for the original bill, which has been reported by the committee as an amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. I accept the Senator's statement and do not insist upon the reading of the report.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3211) authorizing the sale of Gasparilla Island Military Reservation, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell or to cause to be sold, either in whole or in two or more parts, as he may deem best for the interests of the United States, or any interest therein or appurtenant thereto, the Gasparilla Island Military Reservation, in the State of Florida, no longer needed for military purposes, except such part or portion thereof as is occupied by the Department of Commerce for lighthouse purposes, and to execute and deliver in the name of the United States and in its behalf any and all contracts, conveyances, or other instruments necessary to effectuate such sale.

SEC. 2. In the disposal of said lands the Secretary of War shall cause the same to be appraised, either as a whole or in two or more parts, by an appraiser or appraisers to be chosen by him for each tract, and in the making of such appraisal due regard shall be given to the value of any improvements thereon and to the historic interest of any part of said land.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of War shall sell or cause to be sold said property at public sale at not less than the appraised value, after advertisement in such manner as may be directed by the Secretary.

SEC. 4. A full report of transfers and sales made under the provisions of this act shall be submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. The expense of appraisal, survey, advertising, and sale shall be paid from the proceeds of the sale, and the net proceeds thereof shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of "Miscellaneous receipts."

SEC. 6. The authority granted by this act shall not repeal any prior legislative authority granted to the Secretary of War to sell or otherwise dispose of lands or property of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. The substitute, as I have stated, has been prepared in accordance with the recommendation of the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have the report on the bill printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report (No. 549) submitted by Mr. FLETCHER was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 549, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session]

GASPARILLA ISLAND MILITARY RESERVATION

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany S. 3211:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3211) authorizing the sale of Gasparilla Island Military Reservation, having considered the same, report thereon favorably with the recommendation that it do pass with an amendment.

The present occupants of the Gasparilla Island Military Reservation have certain vested rights in the lands and improvements thereon. It is understood that the appraisal and sale to be made under this act would cover only the right, title, and interest of the United States in the lands and the public improvements thereon, it not being intended by this act to alter or modify in any way any rights heretofore created in the reservation.

The bill, as amended, has the approval of the War Department, and the letter of approval of the Secretary of War is appended hereto and made a part of this report, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 9, 1924.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: Referring to your request of May 6, 1924, for a report on S. 3211, a bill authorizing the sale of Gasparilla Island Military Reservation, I am pleased to inform you that the War Department has no objections to legislation authorizing a sale of those lands. However, I desire to suggest certain amendments which, in my judgment, would be protective of the Government's interests.

As will be noted, the bill does not require appraisal, advertisement before sale, public sale, report of sale to Congress, use of sale proceeds to meet the sale expenses, nor is there any protective provision to avoid possible repeal of prior legislation. Each of these provisions is contained in the act of March 4, 1923 (42 Stat. 1450), which authorizes the sale of 45 military reservations and is the latest expression of governmental policy as to sales of military lands. It is recommended that the bill be amended to include the foregoing, it being particularly important that authority be given for use of the sale proceeds to meet the sale expenses. For your convenience and consideration, I inclose herewith the draft of a bill containing the foregoing suggestions.

Gasparilla Island is several miles in length and is situated at the entrance to Charlotte Bay on the west coast of Florida. The military reservation has an area of approximately 532 acres and was withdrawn from public domain for military purposes in 1882. There are no fortifications or other military installations thereon. The Department of Commerce occupies a part thereof, approximately 93 acres, for lighthouse purposes, under War Department permit. It will be noted that S. 3211 excepts such tract from sale. The south 2 miles of the island constitutes the military reservation, the northerly portions being privately owned. The Charlotte Harbor & Northern Railway Co. has a tract traversing the island and connecting with the mainland lines. This railroad line was authorized by the act of June 13, 1902 (32 Stat. 384), and in addition to a right of way, this company for some years has occupied additional acreage on the reservation by lease from the War Department. Its present lease expires January 20, 1925. The remainder of the reservation, excepting the lighthouse tract, has been under lease to the Boca Grande Land Co. for some years, the present lease expiring December 1, 1924. A resort hotel owned by one of these lessees is situated on lands adjoining the reservation and the Government land has long been used as a golf course. It is understood that both the railway company and the land company are subsidiaries of the American Agricultural Chemical Co., a New York concern. A permit for a public road is outstanding.

The military reservation is not required for military purposes and disposition thereof has been contemplated by the War Department. As these lands were reserved from the public domain, there is present authority for that transfer thereof to the Interior Department by Executive order pursuant to the act of July 5, 1884 (23 Stat. 103). That act authorizes the Interior Department to sell the lands so transferred at public sale at not less than the appraised value.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS, Secretary of War.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7982) to extend for the period of two years the provisions of Title II of the food control and the District of Columbia rents act, approved October 22, 1919, as amended.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 114) to vacate certain streets and alleys within the area known as the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia; and to authorize the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to its southern terminus south of Dahlia Street, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Butternut Street, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. ZIHLMAN, Mr. LAMPERT, and Mr. BLANTON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ORDER FOR A RECESS UNTIL TO-MORROW

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as we are to have the calendar considered to-night, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business this evening it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-night it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think there is no objection to that arrangement. I have heard of none.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

RECESS

The hour of 5.30 o'clock having arrived, the Senate, under the previous order, took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that we commence the calendar where we left off on the last call, at No. 335.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. May action on the request be deferred until we examine the calendar?

Mr. CURTIS. Then let us commence at the beginning.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not make that request.

Mr. CURTIS. In order to save time let us commence at the beginning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will announce the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 55) making an appropriation to pay the State of Massachusetts for expenses incurred and paid, at the request of the President, in protecting the harbors and fortifying the coast during the Civil War, in accordance with the findings of the Court of Claims and Senate Report No. 764, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, was announced as first in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1181) naming the seat of government of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 33) making eligible for retirement under certain conditions officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the bill go over. That is a pension bill that has already been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) for the relief of Capt. Ramon B. Harrison was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) to stimulate crop production in the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

GORDON G. MACDONALD

The bill (S. 1013) for the relief of Gordon G. MacDonald was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. This appears to be a bill for the retirement of an officer in the Naval Reserve. I wonder why it was referred to the Committee on Claims instead of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It was referred to the Committee on Claims and thereafter referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and both committees reported unanimously in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I make no objection.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Gordon G. MacDonald, who, while serving as a lieutenant, United States Naval Reserve Force, was found by a naval retiring board to be permanently incapacitated for active service by reason of physical disability incurred in the line of duty as a result of an incident of the service, in time of war, shall be eligible for retirement; and the President is hereby authorized to place him upon the retired list with the rank and three-quarters of the pay of the grade held by him at the time such physical disability was incurred.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 124) directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to secure information relative to amount of money expended for the purpose of creating public interest favorable to railroad sentiment was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let it go over. It is under consideration now in connection with the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 185) to promote agriculture by stabilizing the price of wheat was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2401) providing for the compensation of retired warrant officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, or any other service or department created by or under the jurisdiction of the United States Government, and warrant officers and enlisted men of the Reserve Corps of the Army and Navy, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2691) to amend the Penal Code was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WRITS OF ERROR

The bill (S. 2693) in reference to writs of error was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been considered as in Committee of the Whole and an amendment agreed to.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, heretofore agreed to, was, in section 2, page 1, line 6, before the words "all cases" to insert the word "in," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the writ of error in cases, civil and criminal, is abolished. All relief which heretofore could be obtained by writ of error shall hereafter be obtainable by appeal.

SEC. 2. That in all cases where an appeal may be taken as of right it shall be taken by serving upon the adverse party or his attorney of record, and by filing in the office of the clerk with whom the order appealed from is entered, a written notice to the effect that the appellant appeals from the judgment or order or from a specified part thereof. No petition of appeal or allowance of an appeal shall be required: Provided, however, That the review of judgments of State courts of last resort shall be petitioned for and allowed in the same form as now provided by law for writs of error to such courts.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMUTATION OF QUARTERS, HEAT, AND LIGHT

The bill (S. 2299) to validate the payment of commutation of quarters, heat, and light under the act of April 16, 1918, and of rental and subsistence allowances under the act of June 10, 1922, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was passed on March 31, 1924, and a motion to reconsider entered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the Senator from Utah will not insist upon the motion now. If so, I will let the bill go over.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], as the Senator from New York remembers, wanted to speak upon the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He did so the last time the bill was brought before the Senate.

Mr. KING. He spoke only a short time. The Senator will recall that he was unable to conclude and stated that when the bill was before the Senate again he would further discuss it. I know he wants to discuss it quite fully. He has some matters of which I think the Senate should be advised. I have no disposition to delay its consideration, but I feel constrained under the circumstances to appeal to the Senator to let it go over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the Senator's appeal is directed to me, and if acceded to means that I consent to the defeat of the bill at this session.

Mr. KING. I do not ask the Senator to do that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill has passed the Senate once after full explanation, and then was brought back from the House at the request of the Senator from Utah, and a motion to reconsider was entered. Here it is now. Everything that was done has been brought back. I can not get all the Senators here at the same time who have been interested in it. It has been brought up again and again.

Mr. KING. I shall join with the Senator, as soon as we finish with the War Department appropriation bill, to-morrow or at any other time the Senator may ask, for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But we are to recess to-night until 12 o'clock to-morrow and then proceed with the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. I shall join with the Senator any time he indicates and ask for the consideration of the bill. The Senator has been very courteous.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May it be temporarily laid aside? Perhaps the Senator from Nebraska will come in later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over temporarily.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2149) to facilitate and simplify the work of the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture, and to promote reforestation, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been heretofore passed and reconsidered.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. KING. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2150) to authorize arrests by officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture in certain cases, and to amend section 62 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2151) to increase the subsistence and per diem allowances of certain officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SIOUX INDIAN CLAIMS FOR DESTRUCTION OF HORSES

The bill (S. 1174) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine claims of certain members of the Sioux Nation of Indians for damages occasioned by the destruction of their horses was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has previously been read and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] if any estimate has been made of the probable cost, and the reason why so many years have elapsed since the alleged tort was committed without payment?

Mr. STERLING. This is a claim for 465 horses and ponies that were killed on the order of the Government. It was supposed in the first instance that they were infected with the glanders, and therefore the order was given to investigate and kill them. A veterinarian was sent out for that purpose. He went in and killed 465 of the horses, 288 of which were owned by an Indian woman who had a large ranch, and for the 288 she received a judgment of $29,500 in the Court of Claims, where her case was fully considered and tried. The remaining number, about 173, I think, were killed under exactly the same circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Court of Claims made a favorable finding in the case referred to it?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas I have here the decision of the Court of Claims in the first case.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not desire that the Senator should read the decision if he is familiar with it. I merely asked if it was a favorable decision.

Mr. STERLING. It was a favorable decision.

Mr. WARREN. What was the amount involved?

Mr. STERLING. The amount in that case was $29,500. The bill does not appropriate any amount; it simply authorizes the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion to investigate, adjust, and determine the unsettled claims on the part of the owners of the horses.

Mr. KING. And refer it back to Congress?

Mr. STERLING. And refer it back to Congress for Congress to make such appropriation as may be necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the bill authorize a reexamination of the other claim?

Mr. STERLING. I think not, since that has been decided by the Court of Claims, and judgment was awarded and paid.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. HARRELD. This bill was before the Committee on Indian Affairs and we made a favorable report upon it. There is only one trouble in the case. I remember that in 1895 such ponies sold at public auction in my State for $10 or $15 apiece, and I think the Secretary of the Interior ought to be instructed in making settlement not to settle for the horses at present-day prices.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think there will be any attempt to do that, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma. I want to say in reference to the claim of Mrs. Rousseau that she had some very valuable blooded horses kept for breeding purposes, and that is the reason why the judgment was as great as it was in her case—$29,500. I have an idea that the rest of the horses were Indian ponies, not worth to exceed $20 or $25 apiece.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the Senator about the language of the bill. It appears to authorize an investigation by the Secretary of the Interior into the cases of the Indians who had horses killed under the conditions stated, and I am not sure that it does not authorize a reinvestigation of the Rousseau claim. Was Mrs. Rousseau an Indian?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; she was a Sioux Indian.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think if the Senator will read the language of the bill he will find that it probably authorizes a reinvestigation of that claim.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Arkansas will note the language, it refers to the claim. Mrs. Rousseau can have no claim here now, her claim having been adjudicated and satisfied.

Mr. FLETCHER. It involves the question of attorneys' fees and compensation, does it not?

Mr. STERLING. The compensation of attorneys will have to be paid out of the amount allowed for the claim, and that is to be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. I think that is well enough safeguarded so the Indians will not be imposed upon to pay extortionate attorney fees.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did the Senator say the Rousseau judgment had been paid?

Mr. STERLING. I think it has been paid. The judgment was rendered in 1909 by the Court of Claims, if I remember correctly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill provides for the investigation of other cases?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; it provides for the investigation of the other cases of horses killed under exactly the same conditions.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I do not think the bill ought to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina object to its present consideration?

Mr. DIAL. This claim originated in 1895, 1896, and 1897. The veterinary who passed upon the condition of the horses in all probability is dead. Now, to come here 30 years after that time and go back to other cases and say that the Government veterinary was wrong, that he made the same mistake on three successive occasions in three different years and had these horses killed, is unbelievable. If the Government has employed that kind of people, it is time it is waking up.

It seems to me to be a waste of the taxpayers' money to go ahead and entertain this claim at this late day. It is establishing a very bad precedent, indeed, for us to come here and pass upon the acts of individuals some 30 years ago without having more proof before us than the report here disclosed, simply upon the theory of some similar case of some widow out there because her horses were killed. I think it is carrying the theory of responsibility of the Government entirely too far. I do not see how the Government could ever get beyond the reach of similar claims if we paid this one. Here some time ago I believe we paid a claim—at least the bill passed the Senate—where a Government veterinary was said to have stood by and watched them dip some cattle coming over from one State and going into another State because it was claimed it would spread the cattle fever.

I do not know whether or not the Government received any money for inspecting these horses or anything of that kind. This is one of those same cases where although we sit here as a jury, yet we are not prepared to pass upon the facts of the case. Why should a question like this be brought to Congress? It should be referred to a court to pass upon the legality of the claim. It is beyond my belief that there ever were veterinarians employed by the Government who would make the same mistake in three successive years. What they were doing was for the good of the Indian tribe and the community in keeping some horse disease from spreading and horses were killed. After the testimony which has been offered, I do not think we ought to entertain the claim, and I hope the bill may be defeated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. DIAL. No; I do not object. I want to vote against the bill. I think we have set apart to-night in order to consider these cases.

Mr. ROBINSON. I inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether a similar measure has passed the House of Representatives at this session?

Mr. STERLING. I think not, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. It has been suggested to me that such a bill had been passed by the House.

Mr. STERLING. There may be such a bill pending there, but I know of no such bill having passed.

The Indians have been making claims for these losses for years, so far as that is concerned, and I think bills have been introduced heretofore covering the claims, but have not received consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota permit a question?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KING. What does the Senator understand is meant by the words "adjust and determine"? Does that mean that the Secretary is authorized to pay or simply to ascertain the facts?

Mr. STERLING. He is authorized simply to ascertain the facts and make a report on the facts.

Mr. KING. Then why would not the Senator consent to amending the bill by striking out the words "adjust and determine" and to insert in lieu thereof "and report to Congress the facts in regard to," so that it will read:

> That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to investigate and report to Congress the facts in regard to the claims of members of the Sioux Nation.

If the Senator construes the word "adjust" as he has just interpreted it, he ought to accept my amendment, which I now offer.

Mr. STERLING. I suggest that the purport of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah is contained in the bill, taking the text of the bill altogether. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior is to "report the amounts so ascertained and determined to be due the various claimants and attorneys to Congress not later than December 3, 1924, through the Treasury Department." I think that fairly covers the idea suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota. There seem to be a number of attorneys in this case. What have the attorneys done for which they should be paid?

Mr. STERLING. I can not say what all the attorneys have done as yet, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. OVERMAN. No suit has been brought?

Mr. STERLING. No suit has been brought that I know of.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the language mean that we are to pay a lot of lobbyists and attorneys who have been here?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think that the bill contemplates that the Secretary of the Interior will be authorized to pay lobbyists for getting the claims through. There would be attorneys of record in case any suits had been brought, and I know of no suits having as yet been brought. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to know what services have been performed by attorneys for these claimants.

Mr. STERLING. I know of none now. In any event, attorneys will not be paid any compensation separate and apart from the amounts allowed on the claims.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Indians would be cheated unless the attorneys performed some service in their behalf.

Mr. STERLING. I would be willing to trust the Secretary of the Interior in that regard.

Mr. OVERMAN. Attorneys may come here and lobby in behalf of bills but perform no service. Does the Senator know whether the attorneys have a contract with the Indians?

Mr. STERLING. I know of no contracts on the part of the Indians with any attorneys in regard to the matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. There have been claims here where attorneys have had contracts and yet have rendered no service except to appear before Congress as lobbyists, which contracts are null and void, as the Supreme Court has decided. I do not know whether these are attorneys of that sort or not. I do not know anything about them.

Mr. STERLING. I do not believe there is any contract with the Indians for paying any attorney for his services in regard to this matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator know how many attorneys there are?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1174) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine claims of certain members of the Sioux Nation of Indians for damages occasioned by the destruction of their horses.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, notwithstanding the statement made by the Senator from South Dakota, I renew my motion; and if that prevails, I shall move to strike out the words to which the Senator called attention in lines 11, 12, and 13, on page 2. There is no reason why the report should be made to the Treasury Department. If anybody is to be reported to, it should be Congress. The Secretary of the Interior, as I understand the purport of the bill, is to be made a fact-finding commissioner to determine what the facts are and to report them to Congress. With all due respect to the able Senator from South Dakota, the proper way would have been to remit the matter to the Court of Claims and let that tribunal ascertain the facts; but that course has not been pursued, so I move the amendment which I have offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Utah has expired. The Secretary will state his proposed amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, in lines 5 and 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "adjust and determine" and to insert "and report to Congress the facts in regard to."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to remind Senators of the terms of Rule VIII.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Utah is familiar with the rule. I rose for the purpose of making a motion. I move to strike out in lines 11, 12, and 13 the words "through the Treasury Department, for payment as legal claims out of appropriations that may be made by Congress therefor." That amendment is necessary in view of the amendment which has just been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 192) to provide for a girls' dormitory at the Fort Lapwai Sanatorium, Lapwai, Idaho, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is the money in this case to be paid out of the Treasury or out of Indian funds?

Mr. HARRELD. The appropriation is to be made out of the Treasury.

Mr. OVERMAN. There are a number of public buildings we should like to have provided for. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2327) to amend section 4 of the interstate commerce act was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that is what is known as the "long and short haul" bill, which is under consideration before the Senate, and therefore I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1707) appropriating money to purchase lands for the Clallam Tribe of Indians in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that bill ought to be passed, but it involves such a large sum that I do not believe it can be passed to-night under the rule. So I myself ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1809) for the relief of Emelus S. Tozier was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

DEPUTY CORONERS IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 116) to amend section 196 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 196 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia by striking out that section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 196. Deputy coroners: The Commissioners of said District shall have authority to appoint two deputy coroners, who shall assist the coroner in the performance of his duties aforesaid, and shall perform the same duties in case of the absence or disability of the coroner. The deputy coroners shall serve and receive pay only in case of the absence or disability of the coroner, and when serving, their duties shall be the same as the aforesaid duties of the coroner. The deputy coroners shall, while acting, receive compensation at a rate not exceeding $5 per day, to be paid as other expenses of said District, and each shall give bond in the penalty of $2,500, with security to be approved by the Supreme Court, conditioned for the due performance of his duties.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I should like to state that the original law provided for one deputy coroner, while this bill provides for two, or one additional. It seems to be very necessary to have the additional coroner in the District at this time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC LAND GRANTS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 82) directing the Secretary of the Interior to withhold his approval of the adjustment of the Northern Pacific land grants, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, inasmuch as a similar measure to the one the title of which has just been read has been passed by the House and is now on the Senate Calendar, I move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The resolution (S. Res. 200) directing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the right of the Secretary of the Treasury to hold his office was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I ask that that resolution go over under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over under Rule IX; but the Chair is of the opinion that there is no such thing as the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been the custom of the Senate, however, to place measures on the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We have on the calendar a page which is headed "Under Rule IX."

Mr. OVERMAN. We always have had a calendar under Rule IX, and there is one now.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Chair will look on page 25, he will find there the heading "Under Rule IX," and it is to that page that I ask that this resolution go.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that, but the Chair is of opinion that there is no authority for it. However, the Chair will not interfere with the custom of the Senate.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1639) to provide for the appointment of a court reporter by each judge of the United States district court, fixing their salaries and fees, defining their duties, and repealing all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that bill go over.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I should like to have that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CAPT. JOHN W. LOVELAND, JR., DECEASED

The bill (S. 1387) to provide for payment of the amount of a war risk insurance policy to a beneficiary designated by Capt. John W. Loveland, jr., deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to withhold his objection for a moment, and will inquire if he has read the report?

Mr. KING. I have not.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to explain this measure to the Senator. The bill is designed to pay the insurance that was taken out by young Captain Loveland, who died shortly after his return from the World War. He had kept up his insurance and had written to the Veterans' Bureau in regard to the renewal of it and perhaps a transference of the name of the beneficiary, and perhaps a change in terms which the bureau was then offering to those who had taken out insurance during the term of the war.

The record discloses a mere pencil mark in the records of the Veterans' Bureau tending to show—that is the explanation given by the bureau—that some information was sent him; that the custom was to send out a printed form; and that the blue-pencil mark showed that. So far as the evidence shows, young Loveland never did receive this information and was waiting to receive it, having paid his assessments up to that time. The correspondence shows that he was up to date, shortly before his death, and was depending upon the information to be received from the bureau. Then he died; and the bureau since that time has claimed that his insurance lapsed; that this blue-pencil mark showed that they had sent him this information on the printed form, and that they could do nothing. The boy during his lifetime complained to his parents that he had not received this information and wondered why it was, and the record seemed to show nothing beyond this blue-pencil mark of a customary procedure on the part of the bureau. There was nothing to show the receipt of this information by the boy; and the committee—although I am not reporting out the bill—were of the opinion that the facts plainly showed that the boy did everything he could, and the records of the bureau did not show that they had fulfilled their obligations in giving him the information to which he was entitled.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know that Director Forbes was much authority; but I notice, on page 6 of the report, that he said:

In view of the general terms of the war risk insurance act, applying to all alike, and the fact that the bill is a special measure which amounts in effect to a pension, I am opposed to such special legislation as opening the way to the granting of free insurance.

As I say, I do not know that Mr. Forbes's opinion about this matter is of very much value. I would a great deal rather take the Senator's opinion about it. The Senator thinks the bill ought to pass, does he?

Mr. BAYARD. I had occasion to examine into this claim last year, so I happen to know the details of it. It came then just at the end of the session, so the bill was not reported out on the floor. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] reports it out this time. It seems to be otherwise a worthy claim, and the committee were unanimous in reporting it out.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I objected to the consideration of the bill, and in view of the statement made by the Senator I am very reluctant to persist in the objection. I can see, however, because I know something about the insurance matters there, that if we pass this claim upon the statement made by the Senator we will have hundreds if not thousands of applications to open up insurance cases which have been closed, the result of which no one can foresee. I think there ought to be further investigation before we pass this measure, because of the precedent which will be established; and if my friend will indulge me I shall ask that it go over until we can get a little further light on it.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state to the Senator that I am quite sure we will not get any more information in this case. I personally examined the records with great care last year, and for the reasons stated I did not report out the bill just at the close of that session. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] did the same thing at this session, and he has come to the conclusion that the bill should pass, and so reported to the full committee, which has reported the bill unanimously. We have gotten every piece of paper we can lay our hands on as far as the department's records are concerned.

Mr. KING. I think we should know the effect of this as a precedent, and I beg that the Senator will not appeal to me to withdraw the objection which I have made.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think it will establish a precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2685) for the relief of the Davis Construction Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

LEASING OF UNALLOTTED INDIAN LANDS

The bill (S. 2314) to permit the leasing of unallotted lands of Indians for oil and gas purposes for a stated term and as long thereafter as oil or gas is found in paying quantities, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma explain the bill?

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, this bill applies only to unallotted lands. Under the general mining law certain Indian lands can be leased only for 10 years for oil. The law was intended to be applicable to other minerals, but it is applicable to petroleum. The Indian lands that come within this general mining law limiting to 10 years the time for which leases can be made are at a disadvantage when it comes to leasing. Nobody will take a lease on Indian land for petroleum for 10 years, because it takes that long to develop a tract of land, usually, if it is oil land; and, more than that, as time goes on apace and the 10-year limit comes nearer, it is impossible to get them to do anything toward developing it.

Very frequently lands leased under this 10-year tenure lie by the side of a tract that is leased on the usual terms, and the usual terms are to lease lands for 10 years or as long thereafter as oil or gas is produced in paying quantities, which makes the lease a continuing lease. Very frequently these lands that can be leased only for 10 years lie alongside a tract that is leased for 10 years or as long as oil or gas can be found in paying quantities. The consequence is that production work is pushed on the one and retarded on the other, and it amounts to drainage in some instances. So this bill was introduced, at the instance of the department, to cure that condition, to make it possible to lease all unallotted Indian lands after full notice on the same terms as the others, which means for 10 years or as long thereafter as oil can be found in paying quantities. It is to be done at public auction also.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ought to know, perhaps, but I do not: What are unallotted Indian lands?

Mr. HARRELD. Those that have not been allotted in severalty, that belong to tribes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Who controls the land? What is this council speaking for the nation?

Mr. HARRELD. Almost every tribe has a council.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of its own people?

Mr. HARRELD. Of its own people, where they have unallotted lands. All the tribes that have unallotted lands have a council of some sort, and this bill provides that these leases shall be made upon their application.

Mr. McKELLAR. Where does the money go—to the tribe?

Mr. HARRELD. It goes into the tribal fund, and then is distributed among the members of the tribe.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HARRELD. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator will remember that when the bill was up before I objected to its consideration. I do not desire to object now, but I do desire to call the attention of the Senator to the language at the end of the amendment. It seems to me that is very important. It reads:

And the terms of any existing oil and gas mining lease may in like manner be amended by extending the term thereof for as long as oil or gas shall be found in paying quantities.

Therefore, the bill applies not only to future leases but to any lease already made, which, under this amendment, may be extended indefinitely.

Mr. HARRELD. That is true; and the argument I have just made makes it very desirable to do that, because most of these 10-year lease lands are not being developed, while lands all around are being developed, and these lands are being drained.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator thinks that the public interest and the interest of the Indians is sufficiently protected?

Mr. HARRELD. I think so. Of course, it is all done under rules and regulations of the department and at public auction. It puts these lands on exactly the same plane as allotted Indian lands as to the making of leases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The committee proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That unallotted land on Indian reservations subject to lease for mining purposes for a period of 10 years under the proviso to section 3 of the act of February 28, 1891 (26 Stat. L. p. 795), may be leased at public auction by the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the council speaking for such Indians, for oil and gas mining purposes for a period of not to exceed 10 years, and as much longer thereafter as oil or gas shall be found in paying quantities, and the terms of any existing oil and gas mining lease may in like manner be amended by extending the term thereof for as long as oil or gas shall be found in paying quantities.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the leasing for oil and gas mining purposes of unallotted lands on Indian reservations affected by the proviso to section 3 of the act of February 28, 1891."

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL BANK ACT TO VIRGIN ISLANDS.

The bill (S. 2919) to extend the provisions of the national bank act to the Virgin Islands of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the national bank act, as amended, and all other acts of Congress relating to national banks, shall, in so far as not locally inapplicable, hereafter apply to the Virgin Islands of the United States: Provided, That such inhabitants of the Virgin Islands of the United States as resided therein and were Danish citizens on January 17, 1917, and who have not since that date elected to preserve their Danish citizenship in the manner provided for in article 6 of the convention between the United States and Denmark signed August 4, 1916, shall be regarded as citizens of the United States within the meaning of section 5146 of the Revised Statutes, as amended: Provided further, That section 19 of the act of February 8, 1875 (18 Stat. L. p. 311), shall not apply to the National Bank of the Danish West Indies: Provided further, That any bank which shall organize under the authority of this act shall not have the right to issue bank notes until after the expiration of the concession granted to the National Bank of the Danish West Indies or the relinquishment of such concession by said bank.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I introduced this bill at the request of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. It has the approval of the Solicitor of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency.

There is at the present time one commercial bank in the Virgin Islands. It was organized under the laws of Denmark. The owners of the bank want to dissolve and reorganize and come in under our national bank act, now that we own the islands. I know of no objection to the bill, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, does the bill define the political status of the inhabitants of the Virgin Islands?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; it takes care of that. They have the same status that the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands have, and they will retain that; but this bill provides that in so far as our law requires that directors of national banks shall be citizens of the United States the law is modified so that the inhabitants of the islands who now control this bank can qualify as directors.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I see no objection to the bill except that it is going to be very expensive to send an examiner over there to examine one or two banks in the Virgin Islands.

Mr. McLEAN. This bank will have to pay that expense.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it expected that other banks may be organized there under the national banking law from time to time?

Mr. McLEAN. Not at the present time, I assume. There is only one commercial bank of any importance there at the present time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

The bill (S. 2905) to amend section 25 (a) of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 25 (a) of the act approved December 23, 1913, know as the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by changing the last sentence of subparagraph (a) of the paragraph which specifies the corporate powers of corporations organized under the said section, to read as follows:

"Whenever a corporation organized under this section receives deposits in the United States authorized by this section it shall carry reserves in such amounts and in such form as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, but in no event less than 10 per cent of its deposits."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator explain that bill?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, under the existing law the foreign finance corporations which are organized under the Edge Act have to maintain a demand deposit or a cash deposit of 10 per cent. They are in no sense commercial banks. They are not permitted to accept deposits subject to check. In fact, they are permitted to accept no deposits except such as are incidental to their foreign business. Banks organized under State law and having the same powers that these banks have are not required to keep any deposits at all. This act does not relieve the corporations of the requirement of the deposit. It simply gives the Federal Reserve Board power to permit them to keep their deposits in some other form than cash—short-time commercial gilt-edge paper, or something of that sort. The passage of the bill is recommended by the Federal Reserve Board. It seems to me that the Federal corporations ought to be put upon a par with the corporations organized under State laws and doing the same kind of business.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DOMINIC I. MURPHY

The bill (S. 1699) authorizing Dominic I. Murphy, consul general of the United States of America, to accept a silver fruit bowl presented to him by the British Government, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Dominic I. Murphy, a consul general of the United States of America, be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept and receive a silver fruit bowl bearing on one side an engraved crest of the British Government and on the other the words "Presented to Dominic I. Murphy by His Majesty's Government, November 11, 1918," the bowl being now in the custody of the Secretary of State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WESTERN STATE COLLEGE OF COLORADO

The bill (H. R. 3104) granting 160 acres of land to the Western State College of Colorado at Gunnison, Colo., for the use of the Rocky Mountain biological station of said college, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, with amendments, on page 2, line 8, after the word "use," to strike out "for a period of two years," and on the same page, line 13, after the word "that," to strike out "for a period of two years subsequent to the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey to the board of trustees of the Western State College of Colorado at Gunnison, Colo., subject to the provisions and reservations of section 24 of the Federal water power act, and with a reservation to the United States of all the coal and other minerals in the lands granted, together with the right of the United States, its grantees or permittees, to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, the following described land, to wit, the south half of the southwest quarter of section 14 and the west half of the northwest quarter of section 23, all in township 51 north, range 1 east, New Mexico meridian, consisting of 160 acres, more or less, for use of the Rocky Mountain biological station of the said college: Provided, That the lands hereby granted shall be used by the State only for the purpose of a biological station, and if the said land or any part thereof shall be abandoned for such use for a period of two years, said land or such part shall revert to the United States; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to declare such a forfeiture of the grant and to restore said premises to the public domain, if at any time he shall determine that for a period of two years subsequent to the passage of this act the State has abandoned the land for the use of a biological station, and such order of the Secretary shall be final and conclusive, and thereupon and thereby said premises shall be restored to the public domain and freed from the operation of the grant aforesaid.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL A. SPAIGHT AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 588) for the relief of Daniel A. Spaight was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as follows, to wit: To Daniel A. Spaight, the sum of $8,269.90, $769.90 of which is for medical expenses; to Elizabeth Tabele, the sum of $2,500; to Mary F. Spaight, the sum of $2,900, $400 of which is for medical expenses; to Thomas F. Sutton, the sum of $700; and to Thomas A. Tabele, the sum of $250, in full settlement for injuries received on June 25, 1922, at Westport, Mass., when an automobile in which they were passengers was struck by an auto truck belonging to and negligently operated by the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Daniel A. Spaight and others."

SALVADOR BUITRAGO DIAZ

The bill (S. 2455) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the Government of Nicaragua on account of damages alleged to have been done to the property of Salvador Buitrago Diaz by United States marines on February 6, 1921, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$750," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is authorized to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Government of Nicaragua, $750, to indemnify Salvador Buitrago Diaz, owner of the newspaper La Tribuna, of Managua, Nicaragua, for damages alleged to have been done to his property by United States marines on February 6, 1921, as set forth in the letter from the Secretary of State dated January 9, 1924, and printed as Senate Document No. 18, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NICARAGUAN INDEMNITY

The bill (S. 2457) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the Government of Nicaragua on account of the killing or wounding of Nicaraguans in encounters with United States marines, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is authorized to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Government of Nicaragua, $11,700, being $1,500 each for the benefit of the families of Manuel Gomez Molino, Obdulio Gomez, Guadalupe Valverde, Francisco Ramos, Estanislao Rocha, Julio Carballo, and Manuel Hernandez, Nicaraguan subjects who were killed by United States marines at Managua, Nicaragua, between the dates of December 8, 1921, and January 25, 1922, and $150 each to Manual Pineda, Alejandro Malespin, Ignacio Dona, Manuel Aburto, Teofilo Garcie, Pedro R. Vega, Gilberto Lopez, and Juan Ortiz, who were wounded by United States marines at Managua, Nicaragua, between the dates of December 8, 1921, and January 25, 1922, as set forth in the letter from the Secretary of State to the President, dated January 18, 1924, and printed as Senate Document No. 24, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether the presence of the marines in Nicaragua was the immediate cause of the outbreak or the assaults which were committed which culminated in injuries to Nicaraguans, and which were the basis of the claims for damages against the United States?

Mr. LODGE. This bill was sent to the committee by the State Department with a recommendation that it be paid. I think there is no doubt that these injuries were caused by the marines. The bill was referred to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], who is not here to-night, I am sorry to say. He is fully acquainted with all the details; but I remember the case. I think the Government should pay the claim.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the record shows that in some of the cases embraced in this bill the marines were tried and sentenced by court-martial for the offenses out of which the claims arise. The committee looked into the matter of the claims somewhat carefully, and I believe they ought to be paid.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt of it. We looked into them very carefully.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTIVE FRANCHISE IN PORTO RICO

The bill (S. 2448) to amend the organic act of Porto Rico, approved March 2, 1917, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions with amendments, on page 3, line 14, after the word "determined" and the period, to strike out the words "a vice governor shall also at such time be elected for a term of four years, under like conditions. He shall act as governor in case of vacancy, the temporary absence or removal, resignation, or disability of the governor, and shall exercise all the powers and perform all the duties of the governor during such vacancy, disability, or absence. The vice governor shall be ex officio the president of the senate"; on line 22, after the word "governor," to strike out the words "and vice governor"; on line 23, after the word "hold," to strike out the words "their offices" and to insert the words "his office"; on line 24, to strike out the words "their successors have" and to insert the words "his successor has"; on page 4, to insert a paragraph, as follows: "The elected governor herein provided for may be removed at any time during his term of service by order of the President of the United States for cause, and may be impeached by the insular house of representatives and on trial by the insular senate may be removed by a two-thirds vote of that body upon conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States or Porto Rico, but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. In the case of removal of any elected governor by order of the President or by impeachment during his incumbency, the President of the United States shall appoint a governor, by and with the advice and consent of the United States Senate, who shall serve the remainder of the term, or until such time as a successor for the unexpired term may be elected at an election to be ordered by the President"; on page 5, line 18, after the word "incumbency," to insert the words "and shall have resided in Porto Rico for at least two years prior to their appointment," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 12 of an act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 12. That the supreme executive power shall be vested in an executive officer, whose official title shall be the Governor of Porto Rico. He shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and hold his office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is chosen and qualified. The governor shall reside in Porto Rico during his official incumbency, and maintain his office at the seat of government. He shall have general supervision and control of all the departments and bureaus of the government in Porto Rico, so far as is not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and shall be commander in chief of the militia. He may grant pardons and reprieves and remit fines and forfeitures for offenses against the laws of Porto Rico, and respites for all offenses against the laws of the United States until the decision of the President can be ascertained, and may veto any legislation enacted as hereinafter provided. He shall commission all officers that he may be authorized to appoint. He shall be responsible for the faithful execution of the laws of Porto Rico and of the United States applicable to Porto Rico, and whenever it becomes necessary he may call upon the commanders of the military and naval forces of the United States in the island to summon the posse comitatus, or call on the militia, to prevent or suppress lawless violence, invasion, insurrection, or rebellion, and he may, in case of rebellion or invasion, or imminent danger thereof, when the public safety requires it, suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, or place the island, or any part thereof, under martial law until communication can be had with the President and the President's decision therein made known. He shall annually, and at such other times as he may require, make official report of the transactions of the Government of Porto Rico to the executive department of the Government of the United States to be designated by the President as herein provided, and his said annual report shall be transmitted to Congress, and he shall perform such additional duties and functions as may in pursuance of law be delegated to him by the President.

"At the general election to be held in Porto Rico in the year 1928, and thereafter at each general election, the qualified electors of Porto Rico shall elect the governor, who shall qualify as such on the first Monday of January of the succeeding year, and upon such qualification the office of the appointed governor shall cease and determine. The governor thus elected shall hold his office for a term of four years and until his successor has been elected and qualified.

"The elected governor herein provided for may be removed at any time during his term of service by order of the President of the United States for cause, and may be impeached by the insular house of representatives and on trial by the insular senate may be removed by a two-thirds vote of that body upon conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States or Porto Rico, but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. In the case of removal of any elected governor by order of the President or by impeachment during his incumbency, the President of the United States shall appoint a governor, by and with the advice and consent of the United States Senate, who shall serve the remainder of the term, or until such time as a successor for the unexpired term may be elected at an election to be ordered by the President."

SEC. 2. That section 13 of the said organic act approved March 2, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 13. That the following executive departments are hereby created: A department of justice, the head of which shall be designated as the attorney general; a department of finance, the head of which shall be designated as the treasurer; a department of interior, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of the interior; a department of education, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of education; a department of agriculture and commerce, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of agriculture and commerce; a department of labor, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of labor; and a department of health, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of health.

"The heads of departments shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of Porto Rico, for the term of four years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the governor.

"Heads of departments shall reside in Porto Rico during their official incumbency.

"The heads of the departments shall collectively form a council to the governor, known as the executive council. They shall perform under the general supervision of the governor the duties hereinafter prescribed or which may hereafter be prescribed by law and such other duties not inconsistent with law as the governor, with the approval of the President, may assign to them; and they shall make annual and such other reports to the governor as he may require, which shall be transmitted to the executive department of the Government of the United States, to be designated by the President as herein provided: Provided, That the duties herein imposed upon the heads of departments shall not carry with them any additional compensation."

SEC. 3. That section 18 of the said organic act, approved March 2, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That the commissioner of agriculture and commerce shall have general charge of such bureaus and branches of government as have been or shall be legally constituted for the study, advancement, and benefit of agriculture, commerce, and other industries; the chief purpose of this department being to foster, promote, and develop the agricultural interests and the welfare of the farmers of Porto Rico; to improve their market conditions and to advance their opportunities for profitable sales of their products, and shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by law."

SEC. 4. That between sections 18 and 19 of said organic act, approved March 2, 1917, a new section is hereby inserted to read as follows:

"SEC. 18 (a). That the commissioner of labor shall have charge of such bureaus and branches of government as have been or shall be legally constituted to foster and promote the welfare of the wage earners of Porto Rico; to improve their working conditions and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment, and shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by law."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendments.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 10, after the word "year," strike out "1928," and insert, "1932: Provided, That if at any time prior to that date a census of Porto Rico, taken under the rules and regulations followed by the United States Census Bureau in such cases, should disclose that the percentage of illiteracy does not exceed 30 per cent, the qualified electors shall be permitted to elect a governor."

Mr. KING. I would be glad to have the Senator from Ohio explain the full import of the amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, this bill was reported by the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions after the most careful investigation and thorough hearing, and upon a report from the War Department favoring the bill, provided that the year to be set for the election of the governor should be 1932 instead of 1928.

The committee reported it, fixing the date at 1928, but my own judgment is, and I made this reservation in the proceedings of the committee, that we ought to conform to the departmental recommendations. The amendment provides that the election shall be held in 1932, but that if at any time prior thereto inquiry by the Census Bureau shows that the percentage of illiteracy shall have been reduced below 30 per cent, then the election may be had anyhow. This affords encouragement to the people there to extend their educational facilities. I believe it will be beneficial, and I think it will not be objectionable to the people there.

Mr. KING. Of course, I shall not try to retard the passage of the bill. I had the honor to offer this bill, and appeared before the committee in its advocacy. I believe that, with the splendid record which has been made by the Porto Ricans, we could have trusted them to the election of their governor long before the date suggested in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

May I say that the records of the hearings show that in the election a greater percentage of the Porto Ricans vote than American citizens vote in any State in the Union. My recollection is that something like 80 per cent, and in some parts of the island a larger percentage than that, of the registered voters—and practically all were registered—participated actively, enthusiastically, and intelligently in the various elections which have been held.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The present Governor of Porto Rico, Governor Towner, appeared before the committee and advocated the passage of the bill. Did he suggest that it should go into effect in 1932? His proposal was that it should take effect at once if I remember correctly.

Mr. KING. Yes; the Senator is correct.

Mr. WILLIS. I have in my possession a letter from Governor Towner, which came to me after this amendment was prepared, in which he said that, in his judgment, it would be all right if it were enacted to provide for 1928, but he does not think 1932 would be objectionable, and in view of the fact that the department and all parties represented—and there were three political parties represented in the large delegation here—finally agreed upon this measure, it seemed to me that it would be wiser to make it 1932, especially in view of the fact to which the Senator from Utah has just been directing our attention, namely, that they have been making splendid progress in education.

In my judgment, if the amendment shall be adopted, as I hope it will be, it will be such an incentive to the people there that before 1932 they will be able to elect their governor. I quite agree with what the Senator from Utah has said about the fine progress made there, and I believe this will encourage them.

Mr. ROBINSON. I attended the meetings of the committee when the matter was discussed, and I heard the testimony of all the representatives of Porto Rico who advocated extending the privilege to the people of Porto Rico to elect their own governor and to make it effective immediately. There was no suggestion in the hearings before the committee, as I recall, that we should defer the privilege until 1932.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator will refer to the report of General McIntyre, on page 7 of the committee report, he will observe that the recommendation is distinctly made there for 1932. That was likewise the opinion of the Secretary of War, and since there was agreement upon it, it seemed to me best to pass it in that form. I hope the Senator from Utah will accept the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the Senator state that the representatives of Porto Rico made an agreement that the provision should become effective in 1932?

Mr. WILLIS. I should not like to make the statement that they agreed to it, but from information——

Mr. ROBINSON. I understood the Senator a moment ago to say that an agreement had been made by the representatives of all the political parties and by the War Department to that effect.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not mean to say that. I wish the Senator from Arkansas would turn for a moment to the report and read what General McIntyre said. This is his language:

> Finally, it should be stated that this recommendation that the Porto Rican people be permitted to elect their governor in 1932 and thereafter is made at this time because of the unanimous request of the representatives of the several political parties of Porto Rico to elect their governor and because it conforms to the American policy heretofore outlined with respect to Porto Rico, and in this most important respect for the first time the political parties in Porto Rico have united in requesting what we had always indicated our intention to grant at the appropriate time.

It seems to me that in good faith we ought to carry that out.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think any sound reason could be assigned for postponing the taking effect of the act until 1932. I shall not object to the amendment if the Senator from Utah agrees to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the matter is passed on will the Senator from Ohio state what the percentage of illiteracy now is in Porto Rico?

Mr. WILLIS. I have forgotten the exact figures. Perhaps the Senator from Utah has them. It is rather high, but they are making splendid progress, and it seems to me that this amendment will encourage them to further progress. I think it is probably something like 50 per cent.

Mr. KING. It is my recollection that it is between 40 and 50 per cent.

Mr. WILLIS. But they are reducing it rapidly, and I believe that with this incentive it will be reduced still more rapidly, and that they will be enabled to elect their governor before 1932. My colleague just advises me that he knows that the commissioner made the statement that the illiteracy is about 50 per cent. I hope the Senator from Utah will accept the amendment.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have visited Porto Rico twice in the last two years, and I desire to testify to the splendid condition and remarkable progress being made in the schools of that island and as to the healthy and happy appearance of the children. It is remarkable. I do not think there is a State in this Union in which the children in the schools are as contented looking and as happy and are doing better work than they are in Porto Rico. I want to say the same thing for the people there in general. They are making fine progress and are worthy of every consideration we can give them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KING. I do not want to accept the amendment. Of course, it is for the Senate to determine. I just want to say that Governor Towner, a very estimable gentleman, whom we all know, who was an able Member of Congress for many years, came before our committee. He is the present Governor of Porto Rico, and he gave very strong testimony in favor of this bill.

The testimony showed remarkable development and progress, not only industrially but intellectually, and all the evidence before the committee showed the devotion and attachment of the people of Porto Rico to this Republic and to our form of government. They exhibited a spirit of loyalty to our Republic and to our institutions that would be creditable to some people who live upon the mainland. I regret very much that the Senator has felt constrained to offer the amendment, and I regret that General McIntyre and the War Department have felt it necessary to make the recommendation.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I wonder if the Senator will permit me to read just a paragraph from a letter which recently came to me from Governor Towner:

> It may be better, in view of the opposition of the Secretary—

That is, the Secretary of War—

> to such an early date, to adopt his suggestion of putting it off until 1932. In that event, however, I hope you will also adopt his suggestion that if before that date the percentage of illiterates is reduced 30 per cent that then the right to elect their governor shall be given the people of Porto Rico.

So he is inclined to accept the amendment.

Mr. KING. I regret very much that the Secretary of War has felt impelled to interpose his personality into the matter. I do not think it was his province to recommend when Congress should grant to the people of Porto Rico the right to elect their own governor. However, he has done so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It seems to me that that criticism of the Secretary of War is utterly unwarranted. Under the statute the Governor of Porto Rico reports to the Secretary of War, and it is the business of the Secretary of War to make his opinions known as to the condition of the island and its government.

Mr. KING. I am very glad the Secretary of War has such an able and eloquent champion in the distinguished Senator from New York, but I repeat what I said a moment ago. The Secretary of War may make his findings and may make his statements to the committee—he did appear before the committee—but I do not think that in legislation of this character his opinion ought to be controlling or that his recommendation should be of the peremptory character which this seems to be.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. Of course, the illiteracy is 50 per cent now. The proviso of the Senator as proposed to be inserted is that when they shall have only 30 per cent illiteracy they shall elect their own governor. It seems to me that the proviso would be nugatory so far as fixing the time is concerned. It could not be expected that they would reduce their illiteracy to 30 per cent before 1932.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator heard the statement that they are making very rapid progress and it was the opinion of the governor that it would be very helpful to them.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would be the most marvelous progress ever made in the world if they did as well as that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not understand that the amendment carries any reference to the reduction of illiteracy. It simply fixes the time at 1932.

Mr. WILLIS. It says that the election shall be in 1932, but if prior to that time the percentage of illiteracy is reduced below 30 then they can elect their governor at an earlier date.

Mr. FLETCHER. I feel that this right ought to be granted to these people. In view of the unanimity of opinion and the fact that they have all united on this date, it ought to be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING. Before the matter is passed by, may I ask whether the amendment on page 5, lines 18 and 19, was agreed to or approved by Governor Towner and by the representatives of the Government?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; that was specifically covered in the recommendations from the War Department. It was not thought necessary that that should be required. Since the governor is now to be elected, it was not thought necessary that the heads of the Government should reside in Porto Rico, but that would be attended to by the governor anyhow.

This is rather an important measure. I ask that the report on the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 356, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session.]

TO AMEND THE ORGANIC ACT OF PORTO RICO

Mr. WILLIS, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, submitted the following report to accompany S. 2448:

The Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2448) to amend the organic act of Porto Rico, approved March 2, 1917, having had the same under consideration, reports thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass with certain amendments.

On page 2, line 23, strike out the word "hapeas" and insert in lieu thereof the word "habeas."

On page 3, line 14, strike out "A."

On page 3, strike out lines 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21.

On page 3, line 22, strike out the word "senate."

On page 3, line 22, strike out the words "and vice governor."

On page 3, line 23, strike out the words "their offices" and insert in lieu thereof the words "his office."

On page 3, line 23, strike out the second word "their" and insert in lieu thereof the word "his."

On page 3, line 24, strike out the words "successors have" and insert in lieu thereof the words "successor has."

At the bottom of page 3 insert the following new paragraph:

> "The elected governor herein provided for may be removed at any time during his term of service by order of the President of the United States for cause, and may be impeached by the insular house of representatives, and on trial by the insular senate, may be removed by a two-thirds vote of that body upon conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States or Porto Rico, but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. In the case of removal of any elected governor by order of the President or by impeachment during his incumbency the President of the United States shall appoint a governor, by and with the advice and consent of the United States Senate, who shall serve the remainder of the term, or until such time as a successor for the unexpired term may be elected at an election to be ordered by the President.

On page 4, lines 24 and 25, strike out "and shall have resided in Porto Rico for at least two years prior to their appointment."

Realizing that S. 2448 contemplates a very important and far-reaching change in the character of the government of Porto Rico, your committee has given most careful consideration to the measure.

Extended hearings were held, during which statements were made by the Governor of Porto Rico, by various officials of the insular government, as well as by numerous citizens representing every shade of political opinion in the island. It was the unanimous opinion of all of those who appeared before your committee that such action as is proposed under S. 2448 would be not only promotive of the best interests of the people of the island but would serve to strengthen the strong ties which bind those people to other citizens of the United States. On this general subject Governor Towner in his statement, page 3 of the hearings, said:

> "This extension of autonomous government, I am inclined to think, is fully justified.
> "You know, as has been suggested here to-day, the steps of autonomy in our dependent possessions are, or should be, at least, gradual, and are, or should be, given to the people in direct proportion to their ability to meet their responsibilities.
> "Following our military occupancy Porto Rico was governed by a military government. Three generals of the Army were the first governors of the island. Then followed the Foraker Act. I think you remember that quite well, Senator McLEAN. The Foraker Act provided for an extension of autonomous government to the island, which gave them the right to elect the lower branch of their legislature but still kept within the control of the President by appointment the upper chamber of the legislature or council, which was equivalent to the senate. Then followed the last act, which was adopted in 1917, which was on a par almost with the Philippine act which you have been considering, which gave the people of Porto Rico the right to elect both the senate and the house of representatives, and which extended to them other powers which it is not necessary for me to take the time to discuss.

"They have been acting under that act down to the present time. They are asking now for a further extension by a grant of the privilege to elect their own governor."

His further statement on page 7 of the hearings confirms the above contention. It is as follows:

"Since 1917 they have had the entire responsibility of the legislation of the island. While the governor has had the right of veto, in so far as I remember it has never been exercised in any important matter. It has been exercised upon some matters of legislation that would be in controversy and which I thought ought not to pass, relating to items of the appropriations; the veto power extends to canceling items in the budget, and, of course, that is exercised sometimes by the governor, and it was exercised by me, but never at any time has anyone suggested that the United States take a part in destroying legislation enacted unwisely or in giving them additional legislation to correct or modify or change legislation that has been unwisely passed by the legislature.

"Of course, one can not say that every act that has been passed by the legislature was a wise act, any more than we could claim that for all of our acts in Congress or anywhere else; but on the whole I think I would be justified in saying that the legislation that has been passed by the Legislature of Porto Rico might well challenge comparison with that of almost any State in the Union. It would be surprising to you, I think, to look through a volume of their laws and note the wisdom of each action and the independence of it as well."

Attention is also invited to the argument made by Hon. Miguel Guerra Mondragon, speaker of the House of Representatives of Porto Rico, page 15 of the hearings, in which he spoke, in part, as follows:

"It has been hinted that the granting to Porto Rico of the right to elect our governor might operate as an encouragement for future independence, for the separation of the island, and the Filipino people is set as an instance of that. But that is not so. When Congress granted a quasi-autonomous government to the Philippine Islands—in other words, granted quasi autonomy to the Filipinos—that did not by itself put independence into the minds and hearts of the Filipinos. They were encouraged to think of independence by the very promise made by Congress to them. In other words, it was Congress that encouraged the people of the Philippine Islands to think of independence, aside from other reasons. That was not so with Porto Rico. Almost at the same time that Congress promised the Filipinos that as soon as their people were able to establish a stable government they would be made independent the people of Porto Rico were granted American citizenship. In other words, Congress established two policies almost at the same time, one for the Philippine Islands and an entirely different one for Porto Rico, and Porto Rico was able to understand what this action on the part of Congress meant. So much so that we knew from the first that American citizenship meant not a mere theory, but something real and something that was an honor as well as a duty.

"When we entered the war and when Congress was about to pass the military conscription bill, Porto Rico, as one man, asked you not to leave her out of that war measure, for we wanted to show our appreciation and to perform the duties and undergo the sacrifices the newly granted citizenship signified. We were given the honor to serve under the flag; and the armistice, when it came, saw 15,000 Porto Ricans at Camp Las Casas ready for battle, willing to seal with their blood the new compact made with the Nation."

Gen. Frank McIntyre, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, War Department, in a letter to the committee, says:

"Finally, it should be stated that this recommendation that the Porto Rican people be permitted to elect their governor in 1932 and thereafter is made at this time because of the unanimous request of the representatives of the several political parties of Porto Rico to elect their governor and because it conforms to the American policy heretofore outlined with respect to Porto Rico, and in this most important respect for the first time the political parties in Porto Rico have united in requesting what we had always indicated our intention to grant at the appropriate time.

"It would seem to be wise to take advantage of this unanimity of opinion in Porto Rico, and thus prevent, if possible, the spasmodic talk, on the one hand, of independence, and, on the other hand, of an incorporated Territory and statehood—requests which could not be seriously considered."

It thus appears that not only officials of Porto Rico, but the representatives of the people of that island and the officials of our own Government as well, who are charged particularly with the responsibilities connected with the insular affairs, are agreed in their view that this measure is a wise one, and that the present time is opportune for its enactment.

It is noted, as disclosed by the hearings, that there is no disposition on the part of the people of Porto Rico to secure independence and separation from the United States. The whole trend of the testimony upon this point is to the effect that the Porto Ricans are proud of their American citizenship and desire to continue indefinitely as a part of the United States. The letter from General McIntyre is a carefully prepared summary of the history of legislation, so far as it affects Porto Rico, and the development that has occurred under this legislation. This document is hereby embodied as a part of the report on this bill:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 29, 1924.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILLIS: General McIntyre has submitted to me your letter of March 27 expressing the desire of your committee for a full expression of the views of the department on S. 2448, a bill amending the organic act of Porto Rico.

Complying with your request, I am transmitting a memorandum prepared in the Bureau of Insular Affairs, which is a statement of the policy heretofore pursued by the United States with reference to the government of Porto Rico and of the reasons why it is deemed advisable at this time to enact the legislation proposed.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS, Secretary of War.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
Acting Chairman Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, United States Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS,
Washington, March 28, 1924.

Senator WILLIS, the acting chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, requests a full expression of the views of the department regarding S. 2448, a bill to amend the organic act of Porto Rico, approved March 2, 1917, with a proposed amendment providing for an elective governor in 1932 and thereafter.

As the providing for an elective governor in the Territory of the United States is a new departure, a brief review of our policy in Porto Rico would seem to be advisable.

The intent of the United States has been set forth for the Executive by our several Presidents and Secretaries of War, who have had the supervision of Porto Rican affairs; by Congress in its several enactments relating to Porto Rico; and by the Supreme Court in its decisions on the political questions arising in Porto Rico. These views have been uniform and have given no basis for the claim that the status of Porto Rico with reference to the United States was in doubt.

The designation of the status—a new one to us—was perhaps first officially applied by the Supreme Court, "Porto Rico is unincorporated Territory of the United States." It might be well to cite, in chronological order, some of the more important official statements and acts indicative of the settled purpose of the United States.

Mr. Root, in his report as Secretary of War for 1899, made clear his view that Porto Rico should be governed by Congress in the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Congress, shortly after the publication of this report, passed an act creating a civil government in Porto Rico. In the debate on the organic act of Porto Rico, Mr. Foraker, the chairman of the committee who managed the bill in the Senate, said that it was not desired to use the word "Territory" in describing the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico, because he and those who were of his mind in the matter did not desire that Porto Rico should be what we had heretofore called a Territory in the United States. In order that this intention should be made clear by the act—

First, the use of the word "Territory" was avoided.

Second, the bill which had originally provided that inhabitants of Porto Rico should be, with certain exceptions, citizens of the United States was amended, on motion of the chairman of the committee, so that they would be "citizens of Porto Rico."

Third, section 1891 of the Revised Statutes, which had been included in the organic acts of all Territories since 1850, was omitted and an effort to include it in the organic act of Porto Rico was defeated. The section provides as follows:

"The Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within all the organized Territories and in every Territory hereafter organized as elsewhere within the United States."

It was clear that Congress did not intend to incorporate Porto Rico into the United States, and that it did not desire to make it a Territory, which might be regarded as a promise of statehood.

The Supreme Court in cases coming before it definitely fixed the relation of Porto Rico to the United States as that of "unincorporated territory," thus Porto Rico's relation to the United States as recommended by the Executive had been fixed by Congress and the congressional legislation was construed by the Supreme Court as doing exactly what it was intended to do.

The first serious effort to amend or remold the Foraker Act was undertaken in 1910. Secretary of War Dickinson visited Porto Rico at the close of 1909, and on January 20, 1910, submitted to the President a report on his visit, recommending certain changes in the organic law. After outlining these proposals, Mr. Dickinson said:

"While I believe the changes recommended by me are desirable, and believe that they will redound to the advantage of Porto Rico and of the United States in their relations with Porto Rico, I feel that I should say that in my opinion the people of Porto Rico have had on the whole an excellent government, and that the people of the United States can look with just pride upon the administration they have given of affairs there."

Mr. Taft transmitted this report in a special message to Congress.

This bill was taken up by the House Committee on Insular Affairs, and after hearings thereon it reported "A bill to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes."

An analysis of the resulting bill is unnecessary. It passed the House of Representatives, but did not receive consideration in the Senate. It is of importance because of the fact that it was the basis of what subsequently became the present organic act of Porto Rico and embodied a number of provisions now unchanged in this act. It developed, however, the view of the committee at that time of the status of Porto Rico. In this regard the committee was unanimous, and its view is best set forth in the following statement made by Mr. Olmsted, the chairman of the committee, in advocating the passage of the bill on the 25th of May, 1910:

"This bill is in line with the recommendations of President Roosevelt. It carries into effect the recommendations of President Taft. It does not provide statehood. It does not promise statehood. It does not incorporate Port Rico into the United States. But it does go as far as, under present conditions, wisdom and prudence dictate, in the direction of constituting Porto Rico a self-governing community under the sovereignty and protection of the United States."

Having undertaken a revision of the Foraker Act, the committees of Congress handling Porto Rican affairs continued a study of the subject until the present organic law was passed and approved on March 2, 1917.

The statements made by Mr. Olmsted, quoted above, continued to be the outstanding policy of Congress and of the Executive until the new law was passed. Mr. Stimson, in his reports as Secretary of War, emphasized the necessity of avoiding anything in the pending legislation which could be construed as creating in Porto Rico an incorporated Territory or as promising to the people of Porto Rico statehood.

It should be observed that while this reformation of the organic law of Porto Rico was under consideration the political control in the United States had passed from one party to another, but that this made no difference in the policy to be pursued in Porto Rico.

The bill which became the organic law of 1917 was considered by Congress at intervals for seven years. The history of the effort to secure the passage of this bill, as well as the views of the executive department in urging it, was thus set forth in the annual report of the Bureau of Insular Affairs for 1916:

"Since 1910, or, in fact, since Porto Rico was placed under the jurisdiction of the War Department, there has been an effort consistently backed by the Presidents and by the department, to obtain for Porto Rico a new organic act which would make the Porto Ricans citizens of the United States and would give to them a practically autonomous government.

"The department contemplated, in recommending an act to replace the present act 'temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico,' that it should embody the following general principles:

"First: The people of Porto Rico should be made citizens of the United States to make clear that Porto Rico is to remain permanently connected with the United States.

"Second. The present fiscal system by which Porto Rico received its own internal revenue and customs receipts should be continued.

"Third. It should be clear that Porto Rico was not made by the act an incorporated Territory of the United States, and therefore it should be made plain that the Constitution and general statutory laws of the United States were not extended to Porto Rico and that there was no direct or implied promise of statehood.

"Fourth. The government given Porto Rico should be as autonomous as consistent with fair efficiency and of a form permitting further extension of powers without radical change in the form of government.

"Fifth. The form of government was to be a development from the experience of Porto Rico and no sacrifice of efficiency was to be made to adapt its form to our theories."

The purposes thus set forth were accomplished in the bill enacted. The statement in the third paragraph that the Constitution should not be extended to Porto Rico is a nontechnical statement, but the idea was well understood in the United States and in Porto Rico, and was that the position of Porto Rico with reference to the Constitution should not be changed by the act, and the Supreme Court held that this was the case, in its opinion, however, stating that—

"The Constitution of the United States is in force in Porto Rico as it is wherever and whenever the sovereign power of that Government is exerted. This has not only been admitted but emphasized by this court in all its authoritative expressions upon the issues arising in the Insular cases, especially in the Downes v. Bidwell and the Dorr cases.

"The Constitution, however, contains grants of power and limitations which, in the nature of things, are not always and everywhere applicable, and the real issue of the Insular cases was not whether the Constitution extended to the Philippines or Porto Rico when we went there, but which ones of its provisions were applicable by way of limitation upon the exercise of executive and legislative power in dealing with new conditions and requirements." (Jesus M. Balzac v. People of Porto Rico.)

Our policy, therefore, having been uniform and the intent being clear progressively to extend to Porto Rico all purely local authority as rapidly as it could be done consistently with fair efficiency, it is obvious that this extension of power would be urged by Porto Ricans and that it would be granted by Congress as rapidly as there should be evidence that powers extended would be for the benefit of the people of Porto Rico.

This particular request from the people of Porto Rico to be permitted to elect their own governor after a certain fixed date is deserving of special consideration because of the fact that it is practically the unanimous request of the people of Porto Rico. It has been urged by the legislative representatives of the three political parties represented in the legislature. This is the more important because it is an evidence of the fact that the three parties are as to this question in line with the policy of our Government. Heretofore two of the parties of Porto Rico have been insistent in urging—

First, the establishment of a Territorial government in Porto Rico.

Second, the extension to Porto Rico of those clauses of the Constitution not now in effect there, desiring that the United States should commit itself directly or impliedly to a promise of statehood for Porto Rico.

What is now urged implies no such promise.

The questions which now present themselves are:

First, should this additional and most important step in creating an autonomous government now be made?

Second, if so, should it take this particular form?

The effect of the passage of the act in question, with the modification suggested, would mean that after 1932 the legislative and executive departments of the government of Porto Rico would be representative of the electorate of Porto Rico, with the exception of the auditor, who would be appointed by the President, as at present. The judiciary would likewise be so, except the supreme court, the justices of which would be appointed by the President, as at present. The several executive departments of the Federal Government would have the same jurisdiction in Porto Rico as at present.

The Porto Rican people prior to the American occupation of that island were without experience in self-government or, in fact, in the operation of any government. Their experience in government may with accuracy be said to have begun first with the military government of the United States and, since 1900, with the civil government established under the Foraker Act. They have had experience for 25 years in the passing of their own laws, in conducting practically all of the affairs of government; the elections have been conducted, on the whole, fairly, the government has been free from corruption, and the administration of justice has not been generally complained of.

Briefly, while not in all respects and in all details a highly efficient government, and while there is perhaps a disposition to extravagance on the part of the legislature, there has never been a failure to meet all obligations when due, and there has been, on the whole, an improvement in the Government in all its branches with the experience acquired, and this nothwithstanding the fact that the local participation in the Government has been steadily increased. On several occasions in the past and for considerable periods residents of Porto Rico have acted as governor and performed acceptably the duties of the office. The experience in government has been brief. The condition as to literacy in the island has greatly improved but leaves much to be desired.

There would seem to be little doubt that if advantage is taken of the next eight years, in 1932 the governorship of Porto Rico could be made elective, not only without a loss of efficiency on the part of the Government, but probably with beneficial results. The responsibility for the selection of the governor will rest with the people of Porto Rico and probably with the leaders of Porto Rican opinion as it may be developed.

There might be added a proviso making the provision for the election of governor contingent upon a certain percentage of literacy in the electorate. Such a provision might have a beneficial effect in stimulating education in Porto Rico. It is probable, however, that the stimulus is unnecessary, and it would seem that the people of Porto Rico are at present making every effort to overcome this inherited disadvantage.

The grant of autonomy to Porto Rico in this form can not but bring up, by comparison, the form of autonomy under which the self-governing dominions of Great Britain have been administered. This brings up for decision whether our own customary form of government—and the only one with which Porto Ricans have had a practical experience—should be continued or whether we should adopt the British system under which a governor would be appointed by the President but would be in effect a presiding officer and not a chief executive.

It would seem wiser to continue the development in Porto Rico along the line heretofore pursued, to make the local government there established conform as nearly as possible to American practice. For this reason it is believed that the provision in the bill meets the situation.

Finally, it should be stated that this recommendation that the Porto Rican people be permitted to elect their governor in 1932 and thereafter is made at this time because of the unanimous request of the representatives of the several political parties of Porto Rico to elect their governor and because it conforms to the American policy heretofore outlined with respect to Porto Rico, and in this most important respect for the first time the political parties in Porto Rico have united in requesting what we have always indicated our intention to grant at the appropriate time.

It would seem to be wise to take advantage of this unanimity of opinion in Porto Rico, and thus prevent, if possible, the spasmodic talk, on the one hand, of independence, and, on the other hand, of an incorporated Territory and statehood—requests which could not be seriously considered.

As to the details of the bill, attention is invited to House Report No. 291 to accompany H. R. 6583, being a report from the Committee on Insular Affairs on a similar bill, which embodies certain amendments which may be deemed advisable. It is specifically recommended—

First. That beginning on line 14 of page 3, the provision for vice governor be stricken out, and that the last sentence on page 3 read, "The governor thus elected shall hold office for a term of four years and until his successor has been elected and qualified."

There is no necessity in Porto Rico of a vice governor. Section 24 of the present organic act, which is continued in effect, would fully meet the necessity of an officer to act in the absence of the governor, and the officer so designated is far better in touch with the duties of the governor than would a vice governor be. The only duty provided for the vice governor is to preside over the senate. The senate in Porto Rico is in session an average of not more than 50 days a year.

Second. That lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 4, be stricken out. It is not believed that such a restriction as to residence is necessary or advisable.

FRANK MCINTYRE, Chief of Bureau.

Section 12 of the bill, up to and including line 8, on page 3, is the existing law.

In the provision for an elective governor it is to be noted that the year 1928 is stated as the time at which a general election shall be held for the purpose of choosing a governor. The recommendation from the War Department is based upon the theory that this election would be held in 1932 instead of 1928. However, it is to be noted that your committee recommends an amendment which gives the President of the United States the authority to remove the elected governor for cause, and also gives power to the insular house of representatives to impeach and to the insular senate to try the elected governor. The causes under which an elected governor may be removed by a two-thirds vote of the senate are the same causes as are designated in the Constitution of the United States.

Inasmuch as the authority of the elected governor would be thus lessened by the power of removal vested in the President, and the power of impeachment vested in the local legislative body, it is believed that the arguments so clearly stated by General McIntyre in favor of an elective governor will still apply, even though it is proposed that the election shall be held in 1928 instead of 1932.

The provision for the election of a vice governor in the original bill is recommended to be stricken out by committee amendment, because it was believed that section 24 of the organic act makes a sufficient provision for filling a vacancy in case of the death or inability of the governor.

Section 24 of the original organic act is not changed by the pending bill, and is as follows:

"SEC. 24. That the President may from time to time designate the head of an executive department of Porto Rico to act as governor in the case of a vacancy, the temporary removal, resignation, or disability of the governor, or his temporary absence, and the head of the department thus designated shall exercise all the powers and perform all the duties of the governor during such vacancy, disability, or absence."

The amendment of section 13 is for the purpose of establishing an independent department of labor. Under the existing law section 13 reads as follows:

"SEC. 13. That the following executive departments are hereby created: A department of justice, the head of which shall be designated as the attorney general; a department of finance, the head of which shall be designated as the treasurer; a department of interior, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of the interior; a department of education, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of education; a department of agriculture and labor, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of agriculture and labor; and a department of health, the head of which shall be designated as the commissioner of health. The attorney general and commissioner of education shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, to hold office for four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President. The heads of the four remaining departments shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of Porto Rico. The heads of departments appointed by the governor shall hold office for the term of four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the governor.

"Heads of departments shall reside in Porto Rico during their official incumbency, and those appointed by the governor shall have resided in Porto Rico for at least one year prior to their appointment.

"The heads of departments shall collectively form a council to the governor, known as the executive council. They shall perform under the general supervision of the governor the duties hereinafter prescribed, or which may hereafter be prescribed by law and such other duties, not inconsistent with law, as the governor, with the approval of the President, may assign to them; and they shall make annual and such other reports to the governor as he may require, which shall be transmitted to the executive department of the Government of the United States to be designated by the President as herein provided: Provided, That the duties herein imposed upon the heads of departments shall not carry with them any additional compensation."

It will be observed that the bill provides instead of a department of agriculture and labor, a department of agriculture and commerce, the head of which shall be designated the commissioner of agriculture and commerce.

Section 18 of the organic act is amended so as to provide a direct statement of the duties of the commissioner of agriculture and commerce instead of those of the commissioner of agriculture and labor. The new section known as section 18a, to be inserted between sections 18 and 19 of the organic act, designates the duties of the new commissioner of labor. It is believed that this amendment will give larger recognition to the dignity of labor, and provide at the same time a more complete stimulus for the improvement of its conditions, and extend the opportunities for profitable employment.

The bill, as amended, is in harmony with the early history and policy of the American Government in its dealings with Porto Rico. It is significant that while there have been different policies advocated with reference to other insular possessions because of changes in political control in the continental United States, there has been a continuous policy followed with reference to Porto Rico. The letter from the War Department points this out, especially in the following language:

"It should be observed that while this reformation of the organic law of Porto Rico was under consideration the political control in the United States had passed from one party to another, but that this made no difference in the policy to be pursued in Porto Rico."

Inasmuch as the proposed legislation is in strict harmony with the historical precedents of our Government and is the logical development of the principle of autonomy which has been applied throughout in the relations between Porto Rico and continental United States, it is believed that the enactment of the proposed legislation will be promotive of public good and a strengthening of the feeling of respect and affection entertained by the people of Porto Rico for the Government of the United States.

The experience of the people of that island thus far under American leadership has been most encouraging. Schools have been built, roads have been constructed, the percentage of illiteracy has been rapidly reduced, health conditions have been improved, business has advanced.

All this is appreciated by the people of Porto Rico, and it is believed by them and by your committee that the enactment of this proposed legislation will serve further to encourage the spirit of progress and advancement which is now so strong in this beautiful island.

EUSTACIO B. DAVISON

The bill (S. 513) for the relief of Eustacio B. Davison was announced as next in order.

Mr. STANFIELD and Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ALLOTMENT OF ISAAC JACK, A SENECA INDIAN

The bill (H. R. 1629) authorizing the removal of the restrictions from 40 acres of the allotment of Isaac Jack, a Seneca Indian, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the restrictions upon the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 21, township 25 north, range 24 east of the Indian meridian, in Oklahoma, which is land heretofore allotted to Isaac Jack, Seneca allotee No. 264, are hereby removed, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be issued to said Isaac Jack a patent in fee simple for said described land.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES A. HUGHES

The bill (S. 2548) for the relief of James A. Hughes was announced as next in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill was reported adversely. I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

CARLISLE BARRACKS RESERVATION

The bill (S. 2949) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell a portion of the Carlisle Barracks Reservation was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the transfer from the Department of the Interior to the War Department of the control and jurisdiction over the parcels known as farm No. 1, farm No. 2, and the Sanno tract, now constituting a part of the Government reservation at Carlisle Barracks, Pa., is ratified and confirmed.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is authorized to sell at either public or private sale, upon terms and conditions deemed advisable by him, the land lying north of the Carlisle-Harrisburg Highway, being part of the tract of land known as farm No. 2, constituting a part of the Carlisle Barracks Reservation, the land to be sold as a whole or in parcels, as the Secretary of War may determine, and to execute and deliver in the name of the United States and in its behalf any and all deeds or other instruments necessary to effect such sale.

SEC. 3. For the acquisition of the additional land needed at the post of Carlisle Barracks for the use of the Medical Field Service School an appropriation of $10,000 is authorized.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS

The bill (S. 2060) to amend the Judicial Code, further to define the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of appeals and of the Supreme Court, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. That is a very important bill. However, I do not want to object to its consideration if some Senator here desires to have it considered and will explain it.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. KING. I shall not object if the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] thinks it can be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would like very much to have it passed, but I recognize that it involves many and very important changes in the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States and the circuit courts of appeals. It will be utterly impossible to consider the proposed changes within the limits that are permitted at this time. While I do not ask it to go over, I shall not be surprised if some one else does.

Mr. OWEN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

QUALIFICATIONS OF POSTMASTERS

The bill (S. 819) prescribing certain qualifications of postmasters of offices of the first, second, and third classes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no person shall be eligible for appointment to fill a vacancy as postmaster of any office of the first, second, or third class who has not actually resided within the delivery of the office and also been a bona fide patron of the office for a period of not less than two years immediately preceding the occurrence of the vacancy to be filled.

The bill was reported without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THIRD-CLASS MAIL

The bill (H. R. 4442) to extend the insurance and collect-on-delivery service to third-class mail, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I would like to have the Senator who reported the bill make an explanation of it, the extent of it, and the cost, if any, to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a House bill, reported by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. It has passed the House.

Mr. KING. I think I shall ask that it go over, to give us a chance to investigate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CALUMET RIVER BRIDGE, CHICAGO, ILL.

The bill (H. R. 2665) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Chicago to construct a bridge across the Calumet River in the vicinity of One hundred and thirty-fourth Street in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, State of Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Chicago, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Calumet River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in the vicinity of One hundred and thirty-fourth Street, in section 36, township 37 north, range 14 east of the third principal meridian, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, State of Illinois, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSQUEHANNA RIVER BRIDGE

The bill (H. R. 6810) granting the consent of Congress to the Millersburg & Liverpool Bridge Corporation and its successors to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River at Millersburg, Pa., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Millersburg & Liverpool Bridge Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Susquehanna River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Millersburg, Pa., in the county of Dauphin, in the State of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE

The bill (H. R. 7063) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Illinois, and the State of Iowa, or either of them, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River, connecting the county of Carroll, Ill., and the county of Jackson, Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Illinois and the State of Iowa, or either of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Savanna, in the county of Carroll, Ill., and the city of Sabula, in the county of Jackson, in the State of Iowa, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSQUEHANNA RIVER BRIDGE

The bill (H. R. 7846) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the North Branch of the Susquehanna River from the city of Wilkes-Barre to the borough of Dorranceton, Pa., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for commencing and completing the reconstruction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress approved September 7, 1916, as renewed and extended by joint resolution approved February 15, 1921, to be constructed by the county of Luzerne, State of Pennsylvania, across the North Branch of the Susquehanna River, from the city of Wilkes-Barre to the borough of Dorranceton, in said county of Luzerne and the State of Pennsylvania, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL AIR STATION AT PENSACOLA, FLA.

The bill (S. 2928) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept certain lands in the vicinity of Pensacola, Fla., to assure a suitable water supply for the United States Naval Air Station at Pensacola, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, when directed by the President, to accept on behalf of the United States, free from encumbrances and without cost to the United States, the title to such lands as he may deem necessary or desirable in the vicinity of Pensacola, Fla., for use as a site and right of way for the construction and maintenance of a pumping station, wells, and pipe line to provide a suitable water supply for the United States Naval Air Station, Pensacola, Fla.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF ROBERT DILLON

The bill (S. 1834) for the relief of the legal representative of Robert Dillon, deceased, was considered, as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the legal representative of Robert Dillon, deceased, for the net proceeds of the cotton purchased, or turned over to him, or owned by him, taken by United States officers, sold, and the net proceeds thereof placed in the United States Treasury, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims of the United States for determination of the law and the facts, under the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863 (12th Stat. L. p. 820), any statute of limitations, or the act of July 2, 1864 (13th Stat. L. p. 376), and all other nonintercourse laws to the contrary notwithstanding, and report to Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DREDGE "DELAWARE" AND STEAMSHIP "A. A. RAVEN"

The bill (S. 2052) to carry out the decree of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania in the case of United States of America, owner of the steam dredge Delaware, against the steamship A. A. Raven, American Transportation Co., claimant, and to pay the amount decreed to be due said company, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Whereas by final decree of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, entered December 21, 1916, in an action in admiralty known as No. 4 of 1914, wherein the United States, as owner of the steam dredge Delaware, was libellant, and the steamship A. A. Raven, whereof American Transportation Co. was owner, was respondent, which action arose out of a collision between the said dredge and the said steamship, occurring in the Delaware River on December 1, 1913, it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed that both the dredge Delaware and the steamship A. A. Raven were in fault as to said collision; that the damage, costs, and interest accruing to each party in said cause be equally divided; and that said damages, interest, and costs were found to be as follows: To the libellant $8,567.34, and to the respondent $14,883.82; and

Whereas upon dividing the damages of the said dredge Delaware and steamship A. A. Raven, as decreed by the court, it appears that there is due from the United States to said American Transportation Co., as owner of said steamship, the sum of $3,158.24: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the American Transportation Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,158.24, in full settlement and discharge of the sum found due to said American Transportation Co. by the decree of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, as hereinbefore recited.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

RELIEF OF ITALIAN GOVERNMENT

The bill (S. 2826) for the relief of the Italian Government was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Italian Government, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $291,001.88 to reimburse said Government for the loss of a cargo of copper as a result of a collision between the U. S. S. Buford and the barge Anode, which occurred in the harbor of New York on January 18, 1919.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move to amend, in line 4, page 1, by striking out the word "pay" and inserting the word "credit." The language of the bill is—

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Italian Government, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $291,001.88.

There is no doubt about the justice of the claim, and I understand from the report that it is only intended that it should be credited to the Government of Italy, but before we pass the bill I think we had better make it a little more clear that it is the intention only to credit that amount of money and not to pay it.

Mr. BAYARD. May I explain to the Senator from Pennsylvania that under the agreement this Government has with the Italian Government immediate payments of this character and similar payments are to be credited to our claim against the Italian Government. We have under our agreement with the Italian Government, in the case of a payment of this kind, the understanding that it shall be taken on their account and no cash actually shall pass. The Senator will find a reference to it in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to say that my understanding is similar to that of the Senator from Delaware. The appropriation is made direct, but whatever amount is appropriated will be credited upon their indebtedness to the United States.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If it is the intention to credit only, I do not see why we should not say so.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the appropriation ought to be made so that it will come out of the Treasury of the United States and be paid with the understanding we have. I know that it will merely be credited to their account.

Mr. FESS. May I call attention to the fact that a similar bill was passed in another instance and we have paid the actual cash? I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct. We ought to put that language in the bill to make sure that it is only to be credited.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Early in the session I remember a similar bill, to which I offered a similar amendment, and there was no objection to it. It seems to me where they owe us over a billion dollars, as they do, we ought not to leave it to be a matter of any doubt whatever that we do not intend the money to be actually paid, but only credited.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a Senate bill and can be put in such form as the Senate sees fit now without causing any delay one way or the other.

Mr. SMOOT. If the amendment is agreed to, then we certainly will have to amend the balance of the bill, because it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Italian Government, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The whole bill would then be out of line.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That would be very easily done by striking out line 5 and the first words in line 6.

Mr. SMOOT. If we are going to pass a bill of this kind, we ought merely to say that "the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to credit the sum of $291,000 to reimburse said Government for the loss of the cargo," and so forth.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If that is what we mean why not say it?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know just how the books of the Navy Department and the Treasury Department would appear as a result of the passage of a bill of this kind. It seems to me the proper way is to make the appropriation and credit the amount. That is exactly what would happen.

Mr. BAYARD. Let me read to the Senator from Pennsylvania the concluding paragraph of Secretary Mellon's letter under date of April 29, 1922. It is as follows:

It is my understanding of the arrangement to which you refer that it gives the Treasury the right, if it should so elect, to make payment of all claims of the Italian Government or any department or agency thereof against this Government or any department or agency thereof by crediting the amount of any such claim on Italian obligations held by the United States. The phrase "all claims" is broad enough to include claims in tort as well as claims in contract, and there is nothing to indicate that the words were intended to have a narrower application in this respect. It is the view of the Treasury, therefore, that if provision is made by Congress for payment of the claim under consideration the Treasury's right to take suitable action under the above-mentioned arrangement would be the same as if the claim were one arising out of contract instead of out of a tort.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania, in view of the suggestion made, accept this amendment? Permit the language of the bill to remain as it is, and at the close add the following proviso:

Provided, That said amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury as a credit upon any sum due from the Italian Government to the United States.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall be very glad to accept that language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw his amendment.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no necessity for it at all because that agreement has already been made between the two Governments.

Mr. KING. Notwithstanding that, I think there is no objection to making it a legislative direction, and I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers the amendment, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. Add at the close of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That said amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury as a credit upon any sum due from the Italian Government to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EAST L'HAVE TRANSPORTATION CO. (LTD.)

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2498) for the relief of the East LaHave Transportation Co. (Ltd.), owner, A. Picard & Co., owner of cargo, and George H. Corkum, Leopold S. Conrad, Wilson Zinck, Freeman Beck, Sidney Knickle, and Norman E. LeGay, crew of the schooner Con Rein, sunk by United States submarine K–4, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the East LaHave Transportation Co. (Ltd.), owner of the schooner Con Rein, of the port of LaHave, in the Province of Nova Scotia, Canada; that the claim of A. Picard & Co., the owner and consignee of the cargo aboard said schooner, and the claims of the several members of the crew of said schooner, namely, George Corkum, Leopold S. Conrad, Wilson Zinck, Freeman Beck, Sidney Knickle, and Norman LeGay, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said schooner and the submarine K–4, owned by the Government of the United States and operated by the United States Navy, which occurred near Block Island, R. I., on August 29, 1921, may be sued for by the said claimants in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court with jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit, and to enter judgments or decrees for the amounts of such damages and costs, if any, as may be found against the United States in favor of the said claimants, or any of them, or against said claimants in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. I should like to have some explanation of that bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I will explain to the Senator from Utah that the bill proposes to give to the East LaHave Transportation Co. (Ltd.), owner of the schooner Con Rein, the right to bring suit in the Federal district court for damages caused by collision occurring between that schooner and a submarine owned by the Federal Government. The bill provides that due notice must be given to the Attorney General, and suit must be brought within a definite time after the passage of the act. The rights of the Government are fully protected, and the court is merely to hear and determine such suit, and to enter judgments or decrees for the amounts of damages.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RUSH O. FELLOWS

The bill (H. R. 3183) for the relief of Rush O. Fellows was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. STERLING. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will withhold his objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina withdraw his objection?

Mr. DIAL. I withdraw my objection for the present.

Mr. STERLING. I think this is a most meritorious claim and ought to be passed. A similar bill has passed the other House. The bill provides for the reimbursement of Rush O. Fellows for expenses incurred in behalf of the Government while he was postmaster at Bellefourche, S. Dak. The Postmaster General says that the department has very carefully examined into the claim of Mr. Fellows, and that it should be paid. I trust that it will be. The expenditures made by Mr. Fellows seem to have been necessary, and the Government got the benefit of those expenditures.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the amount involved, of course, is very small, but these small matters sometimes constitute very vexatious and embarrassing precedents in the future. If the postmaster, without authority, made expenditures and now comes and asks the Government to reimburse him, what limit will there be upon other employees of the Government? I should like an explanation of the bill or I shall be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the explanation is this: During the incumbency of the predecessor of Mr. Fellows the post office was changed from the third to the second class and there were paid out of the pocket of the postmaster certain amounts of money.

Mr. KING. For what purpose?

Mr. DIAL. I desire to know for what purpose the expenditure was made.

Mr. STERLING. The expenditures were made for rent, for one thing. Here are the items paid out by Mr. Fellows:

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Bellefourche, S. Dak., April 30, 1922.

The United States Government, Dr., to Rush O. Fellows, postmaster, from July, 1913, to May 1, 1922

Voucher No. 1. Paid on rent from July 1, 1913, to December 31, 1915, 30 months, at $5 per month	$150.00
Voucher No. 2. Paid on rent from January 1, 1916, to August 31, 1917:
20 months, at $5 per month	100.00
10 months, at $10 per month (from September 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918)	100.00
Voucher No. 3. Paid water tax from July 1, 1913, to November 15, 1920, 88½ months, at $1 per month	88.50
Voucher No. 4. Paid for construction of room on sidewalk for fuel and parcel-post storage	87.50
Voucher No. 5. Paid for janitor service from March 15, 1920, to November 15, 1920, 8 months, at $5	40.00
Paid 50 cents semimonthly for removing ashes and hauling and burning accumulated trash, 88½ months (no vouchers available; work done by different draymen)	88.50
	604.50
But then he is charged with—
Credit: Cash received from rental of basement from July 1, 1913, to June 30, 1917, 48 months, at $5 per month (which was vacated on last date mentioned)	240.00
Balance due or cash from personal funds	364.50

The bill provides for $354.50.

That is due to the fact that he built a shed which was necessary for the use of the post office at an expenditure of $37.50; he then sold the shed for $10, and hence he is charged with $10 received on that account, which reduced the bill to $354.50 for money actually paid out.

Mr. KING. Does the Postmaster General recommend the passage of the bill?

Mr. STERLING. He does. I call attention to the statement of the Postmaster General, which is as follows:

This claim has been carefully considered, and the department is of the opinion that it is a meritorious one, as it is apparent that the amount covered thereby was expended personally by Mr. Fellows in order to properly maintain the service at the Bellefourche office, and that no allowances have been granted by the department to reimburse him for such expenditures.

It being a second-class post office during the time of his incumbency it was the business of the Government to pay these expenses, which were found to have been necessary by the department itself.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to pay to Rush O. Fellows, of Bellefourche, S. Dak., $354.50, to repay him for private funds expended for governmental purposes while he was postmaster at Bellefourche, S. Dak.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, the passage of this bill will establish somewhat of a precedent; but the amount is small and, as the Postmaster General recommends the passage of the bill, I shall not object.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PASSAGE OF HOUSE BILLS BY THE SENATE

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to inquire if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] can give us any sort of assurance that the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol will pay any attention to Senate bills which pass this body. There are a number of House bills coming up for consideration in the Senate, and we are passing them right along, but, so far as I can learn, the Members of the other body are not giving much attention to any bills which may pass the Senate and be sent over there.

Mr. STERLING. The bill which has just been passed is a House bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wonder if the Senator from South Dakota can make some arrangement whereby there will be some understanding that when we pass bills of the House of Representatives they will remember the Senate bills which may be sent to that body?

Mr. STERLING. I hope such an arrangement may be made, and I shall be very glad if it may be.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 6049) for the relief of V. E. Schermerhorn, E. C. Caley, G. W. Campbell, and Philip Hudspeth was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

The bill (H. R. 8235) for the relief of Aktieselskabet Marie di Giorgio, a Norwegian corporation of Christiania, Norway, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like some explanation of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator who reported the bill is not present. The bill will go over.

The bill (H. R. 8237) for the relief of Bruusgaard Kiosteruds Dampskibs Aktieselskab, a Norwegian corporation of Drammen, Norway, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a bill similar to the one which has just gone over.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

J. R. KING

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2669) for the relief of J. R. King, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment in line 4, after the words "directed to pay," to insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to J. R. King, father and administrator of the late Lawrence B. King, a lieutenant in the Air Service of the Officers' Reserve Corps, who died on duty at Clover Field, Santa Monica, Calif., the sum of $478.51, burial and transportation expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

THOMPSON-VACHE BOAT CO.

The bill (H. R. 2123) for the relief of the Thompson-Vache Boat Co., of Bonnots Mill, Mo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the claim of the Thompson-Vache Boat Co., of Bonnots Mill, Mo., against the United States for the loss alleged to have been sustained by the sinking of the steamer Floyd in the Missouri River on March 3, 1920, may be sued for by the company in the United States District Court of the Western District of Missouri, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and the court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter judgment or decree for the amount of such damage, including interest, and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due agtinst the United States in favor of the Thompson-Vache Boat Co., or against the Thompson-Vache Boat Co. in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal; but such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States; and suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, that bill authorizes suit, as I understand, but does not provide for payment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the bill merely provides that suit may be brought in a court of admiralty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, referring to House bill 2123, which was just passed, and which, for the purpose of the remarks I am about to make, I move to reconsider——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the vote whereby the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, will be reconsidered.

Mr. KING. My eye has just rested upon the statement of Secretary Weeks that—

No copies of the affidavits which accompanied that letter were retained on the files of the office of the Chief of Engineers, and no papers except the above-mentioned copy of letter, therefore, accompany this reply.

I also find in a communication from the Assistant Secretary of War the following statement:

It is therefore believed that the claim of the Thompson-Vache Boat Co. is without merit, and that it should not receive a favorable report from the Committee on Claims.

I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 2126) for the relief of C. C. Carson was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EXAMINATION AND REGISTRATION OF ARCHITECTS IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 933) to provide for the examination and registration of architects and to regulate the practice of architecture in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not insist on his objection to the bill. It involves no extra expense to the Government or to the District, but merely provides a method whereby more efficient architects may be provided in the District. The bill will certainly fill a need in the District, and there is evidence of the necessity for such a measure in a great calamity which occurred in the District a year or two ago. As I have said, the bill involves no expense.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 10, on page 4, line 6, before the word "each," to strike out "July" and insert "August," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That a roster showing the names and places of business and residences of all registered architects shall be prepared by the secretary of the board during the month of June of each year; such roster shall be printed out of the funds of the board as provided in section 11. On or before the 1st day of August each year the board shall submit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a report of its transactions for the preceding fiscal year, together with a complete statement of the receipts and expenditures of the board, certified by the chairman and the secretary, and a copy of the said roster of registered architects.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 11, to strike out section 12 as follows:

SEC. 12. That the said board shall have suitable quarters and equipment provided by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the sections will be renumbered to correspond with the amendment which has just been made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Delaware explain the full effect of this bill. The Senator knows that too often in our municipalities there is a disposition on the part of a few of the elite or of the elect in each profession to control the profession and to determine who shall enter the profession, and they set up a sort of machine by which they eliminate from active practice in the profession those that do not measure up to such standards as they may set. What is the effect of this bill?

Mr. BALL. The bill provides for the appointment of a board by the Commissioners of the District to supervise the examination and registration of architects.

Mr. KING. Would it prevent a man from building his own house and acting as his own architect? Would a man have to go before the proposed board of five men who are architects and submit to an examination?

Mr. BALL. If the plans were approved by the engineers of the District, he would not have to do so; but the bill will prevent a man who is not qualified from holding himself out as a recognized architect in the District and having his plans accepted as an architect's plans.

Mr. KING. Is it not one of the objects of the bill—and I have not read it all, as it embraces 14 pages—to keep out of the field of competition here out-of-town architects no matter how competent and able they may be?

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, the first bill that was introduced on this subject grew out of the calamity which befell the Knickerbocker Theater. A number of persons professing to be architects in the District were drawing plans which were not sufficient in their detail and engineering aspects to insure the safety of the structures designed to be built. It was following that disaster that the first bill on this subject was introduced. This is the first time the House has been able to pass such a bill. Now I trust the Senate will also pass the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there may be very great necessity for the passage of the bill; sometimes a very great disaster or a bad decision may result in bad laws. This may be a good bill and it may be a bad bill. I am trying to find out. I shall not object; but, without knowing more about it, I shall refrain from voting, because I can not assent to it without knowing what it provides.

Mr. BALL. I will say to the Senator that this is a good bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand that what the bill intends is that no one shall set himself up as an architect unless he is professionally qualified.

Mr. BALL. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. And that no one shall undertake to practice architecture until he has stood an examination before the board selected by the commissioners.

Mr. BALL. He must be recognized by his profession as a qualified architect.

Mr. FLETCHER. He can not practice architecture until he is licensed by the proposed board. A man may draw plans, prepare designs, and all that sort of thing as an individual, but he can not set himself up and represent himself to be an architect until he has stood this examination.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the bill will a man be able to draw his own plans and build his own house?

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly. Section 14 provides:

> That any person wishing to practice architecture in the District of Columbia under title of architect shall, before being entitled to be or be known as an architect, secure from such board a certificate of qualifications to practice under the title of architect, as provided by this act.

If he does not want to engage in the practice of architecture, the bill does not affect him. I do not know whether the bill provides that architects may come from other States and practice in the District. Can the Senator tell us anything about that? Suppose a builder here wants to erect a building, can he engage a qualified architect in New York or Boston to prepare his plans?

Mr. BALL. The bill requires that before a man may become an architect he shall know sufficient about drawings, and so forth, to pass an examination before the board, just as is required in other professions. When a man receives a certificate from the board he is entitled to represent himself to be a member of the profession.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is nothing in the bill, though, that would prevent the Senator from engaging an architect in New York or in Philadelphia or in Boston, if he so desired, to prepare plans for a building that he might wish to erect in the District.

Mr. BALL. The object of the bill is to prevent the people from selling as architects the results of their labor when they are not professional architects.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1027) to regulate the practice of optometry in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I move that House bill 3236 be substituted for that bill. It has passed the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the bill on the calendar?

Mr. BALL. No; it is not on our calendar, but it has passed the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not yet been reported by the committee?

Mr. BALL. No; but it is here. It has come over from the House.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, unless it is on the calendar, that is not permissible, and I object to it. I suggest that the bill go over. The Senator can report out the House bill, and then we can take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1733) to authorize the Secretary of War to secure for the United States title to certain private lands contiguous to and within the Militia Target Range Reservation, State of Utah, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will somebody explain that bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I know only a little about it. The Government had a military post in Utah, and the target range, as I understand, is not sufficient. That is to say, the Government has not sufficient land of its own upon which to conduct target practice, and this is to enable the Government to acquire it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill would appear to authorize the Government to acquire private holdings within the limits of the present target range. Of course the purpose of that is apparent. If there are private lands there that might be occupied and used for private purposes, that would defeat the object of the target range.

Mr. KING. Yes

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call attention to an apparently adverse report by the Secretary of War. He says:

> In connection with this viewpoint of the War Department it is but fair to state that provision for the acquisition of the parcels of land covered by the bill was not included in the War Department's submit of its budget for the fiscal year 1925, due to more urgent projects that had to be provided within the limiting total of funds allotted to the War Department by the President.
>
> On this account it becomes me to state that the acquisition of the real estate covered by Senate bill 1733 does not fall within the financial policy of the President for the fiscal year 1925.
>
> Sincerely yours,
>
> JOHN W. WEEKS, Secretary of War.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

VALIDATION OF APPLICATIONS AND ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS

The bill (S. 2975) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patents upon the entries hereinafter named upon which proof of compliance with law has been filed upon the payment of all moneys due thereon:
> Homestead entry, Santa Fe, N. Mex., No. 026282, made by Guadalupe D. de Romero on October 24, 1916, for the west half of the southwest quarter, west half of the northwest quarter, northeast quarter of the northwest quarter, north half of the northeast quarter, and southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, section 17, township 14 north, range 22 east, New Mexico principal meridian.
> Additional homestead entry, Las Cruces, N. Mex., No. 017008, made by Joseph S. Morgan on April 1, 1921, for the southwest quarter of section 30, township 17 south, range 10 east, New Mexico principal meridian.

Additional homestead entry, Clayton, N. Mex., No. 028903, made by Allie M. Vickers, widow of James L. Vickers, deceased, on February 2, 1922, for the west half of section 15, township 15 north, range 30 east, New Mexico principal meridian.

Homestead entries, La Grande, Oreg., Nos. 014086 and 015372, made by James A. Wright, for the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, east half of the southeast quarter, section 13, township 11 south, range 41 east, and lots 2 and 3, southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, northeast quarter of the southwest quarter and northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, section 18, township 11 south, range 42 east, Willamette meridian.

Homestead entry, Lamar, Colo., No. 025406, made by John Bond on April 18, 1918, for the west half of the northwest quarter of section 29, and the east half of the northeast quarter of section 30, township 21 south, range 42 west, sixth principal meridian.

Homestead entry, Montrose, Colo., No. 012686, made by Mary A. McKee (Mary A. Ryan, deceased) on November 4, 1919, for the south half of the north half and the north half of the south half, section 20, south half of the north half and the north half of the south half, section 21, township 42 north, range 13 west, New Mexico principal meridian.

Homestead entry, Cass Lake, Minn., No. 09851, made by Joseph La Fond on March 9, 1918, for lot 9 of section 17, township 55 north, range 26 west, fourth principal meridian.

Homestead entry, Blackfoot, Idaho, No. 028692, made by Margaret E. Askew (now Margaret E. Tindall), on July 10, 1918, for the north half of section 25, township 9 north, range 32 east, Boise meridian.

SEC. 2. That the entries hereinafter named be, and the same are hereby, validated, and the Secretary of the Interior authorized to issue patents thereon upon submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the law under which such entries were allowed:

Homestead entries, Douglas, Wyo., No. 026690 and 026691, made by Peter Peterson on April 20, 1921, for lots 3 and 4 of section 30, and lot 1 of section 31, township 37 north, range 62 west, and the east half of the northeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 20, south half of the northwest quarter and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 28, township 37 north, range 63 west, sixth principal meridian.

Homestead entry, Douglas, Wyo., No. 030379, made by Orin Lee on December 10, 1921, for the south half of section 17, township 36 north, range 85 west, sixth principal meridian.

Homestead application, Roswell, N. Mex., No. 050381, filed by Robert T. Freeland, for the north half of section 24, township 5 south, range 14 east, New Mexico principal meridian, subject to the provisions of the act of December 29, 1916 (39 Stat. L. p. 862).

Homestead entry, Santa Fe, N. Mex., No. 040823, made by Charles N. Barnhart on August 21, 1922, for the west half of section 12, township 29 north, range 10 east, New Mexico principal meridian.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow the following application to make entry:

Homestead application, Santa Fe, N. Mex., No. 046215, filed by Feles Montoya for lot 1 and the east half of the northeast quarter, section 36, township 13 north, range 3 east, and lot 10, section 31, township 13 north, range 4 east, New Mexico principal meridian, effective March 7, 1923, the date filed, and that the State of New Mexico through its proper officers be, and it is hereby, authorized to select 134.80 acres of surveyed nonmineral, unappropriated, and unreserved public land in lieu of that part of the above-described tract situate in said section 36.

SEC. 4. That homestead entry 011279, Montrose, Colo., embracing lots 5 to 20, inclusive, section 1, township 48 north, range 8 west, New Mexico principal meridian, may be perfected under the provision of section 2 of the act of July 28, 1917 (40 Stat L., p. 248), by the legal representatives of Clyde R. Hiatt.

SEC. 5. That Hiram Williams be, and he is hereby, allowed to perfect by acceptable final proof homestead entry 049024, Roswell, N. Mex., embracing lots 13 and 14 and the east half of southwest quarter of section 6, township 18 south, range 17 east, New Mexico principal meridian; and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow the application 049025, Roswell, N. Mex., of said Williams, to make an additional entry under section 4 of the stock raising homestead act of December 29, 1916 (39 Stat. L., p. 862), for lots 5 to 12, both inclusive, and southeast quarter of said section 6.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to Francis W. Woodward a patent for the fractional west half of northwest quarter and the fractional northwest quarter of southwest quarter of section 18, township 28 north, range 6 west, fourth principal meridian, Wisconsin, upon payment therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a patent to Lukas Zullig and Max Zullig, infant children of Robert Zullig, under homestead entry 06833, Lakeview, Oreg., for the southeast quarter of section 14 and northeast quarter of section 23, township 26 south, range 18 east, Willamette meridian.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow Y. Charles Earl, of Blackshear, Ala., to purchase at private sale, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, the southeast quarter of southeast quarter of section 23, township 3 north, range 3 east, St. Stephens meridian, Alabama.

SEC. 9. That the Sabine Lumber Co., of St. Louis, Mo., be, and it is hereby, authorized to purchase at private sale the southwest quarter of southwest quarter of section 23, township 1 north, range 19 west, fifth principal meridian, Arkansas, at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, I desire to amend this bill by the addition on page 3, after line 17, of the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

Homestead entry, Missoula, Mont., No. 08533, made by Hudson L. Mason on August 24, 1920, for lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, and the south half of the northwest quarter, southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, and northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, section 1, township 7 south, range 15 west, Montana principal meridian.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this appears to be something in the nature of an omnibus bill validating homestead entries. I presume they are all approved by the Interior Department, or recommended by the department?

Mr. LADD. The bill was submitted by the Interior Department, and there is a written report covering each item.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Was there a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. LADD. There was. I may say that the bill covers only little technicalities here and there that the Secretary felt he would rather have Congress approve than approve himself.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, MINNESOTA

The bill (S. 2977) granting the consent of Congress to the city of St. Paul, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River was announced as next in order.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, inasmuch as a House bill identically the same has passed the House and is on the calendar, I ask that House bill 8229, Order of Business No. 474, on page 16 of the calendar, be substituted in place of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8229) granting the consent of Congress to the city of St. Paul, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate bill 2977 is indefinitely postponed.

LANDS IN FORT ASSINNIBOINE MILITARY RESERVATION, MONT.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) providing an extension of time for payment by entrymen of lands on the Fort Assinniboine abandoned military reservation in the State of Montana was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the act of January 6, 1921 (41 Stat. L. p. 1086), providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation, in Montana, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize extensions of time from year to year for the payment of all unpaid principal upon the payment of interest thereon in advance at the rate specified in the said act, for not to exceed 10 years from date of entry.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES, ETC., FORT BERTHOLD INDIAN RESERVATION, N. DAK.

The bill (H. R. 4494) authorizing extensions of time for the payment of purchase money due under certain homestead entries and Government land purchases within the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether this means that white settlers upon Indian lands have the time extended for making payment, and if so, whether such extension is with the approval of the tribe? The reason why I make the inquiry is because a number of complaints have been brought to my attention, and I know to the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs, by representatives of the Indian tribes, that where lands have been taken from their reservation and sold, or where entries have been made by white settlers upon their lands, payments have been deferred by act of Congress or by regulations of the Interior Department, which has resulted, of course, in deferring for a very long period the payment of money which the Indians had relied upon; and they have made complaints in many instances because of these deferred payments, and have claimed that they were deferred in some instances without their consent.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, as I recall, Fort Berthold Indian Reservation is an old reservation that has been given up, this portion of it, and opened to settlers.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator recall whether the payments derived from the sale go to the Indians or go to the Government?

Mr. LADD. They go to the Government.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM KAUP

The bill (S. 953) for the relief of William Kaup was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the homestead entry of William Kaup on farm unit E. Huntley reclamation project, Montana, under the act of June 17, 1902, the said entry being known as lot 2, section 31, township 3 north, range 29 east, principal meridian, is hereby validated, subject to further compliance with the law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is the unfinished business.

Mr. McKELLAR and other Senators. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FIRST LIEUT. HARRY L. ROGERS, JR.

The bill (S. 2138) for the relief of First Lieut. Harry L. Rogers, jr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$902.63" and insert "$700," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Harry L. Rogers, jr., first lieutenant, Infantry, United States Army, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $700, as reimbursement for the loss sustained by him as commanding officer of the Twenty-fifth Recruit Company, Fort Slocum, N. Y., when such amount was stolen on or about April 1, 1921, by his company clerk, who immediately thereafter deserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] whether any arrangements are made by which these clerks or custodians of war funds in the various departments are under bond, so that in cases like this, where there is a defalcation or a theft, the Government may recover?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not familiar with the terms of this bill. It did not come from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING. No; it comes from the Claims Committee; but it is to reimburse an officer for money stolen.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; a commissioned officer in the Army handling or disbursing funds, as in a case of this sort, is not under bond; but if loss occurs—in the event, for example, that funds are stolen by some other person—they are charged against the officer's account. If he can show, however, that the theft has been perpetrated through no neglect of his own, the War Department is glad to ask the Congress to relieve the officer of responsibility for the funds.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that it might be wise for the War Department to require bonds to be given by those who are custodians of funds?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would involve a very large expense upon a very large number of officers; and I think that if the Senator will think over the matter he will agree that, taking the history of the United States Army as a whole for 130 years, the amount of money lost to the Government of the United States through the negligence of Army officers in cases of this sort is infinitesimal.

Mr. KING. I think that is true.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2793) for relief of estate of Anne C. Shymer was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this question ought to be left to the commission. The commission passes on all these claims and is now sitting. This bill ought not to be here at all. It is for property that was lost on the Lusitania, as I understand. There is a commission now sitting on all claims for losses sustained by the sinking of the Lusitania.

Mr. ROBINSON. Apparently the basis of the claim is that it was sent to the State Department by some one and lost in transit, and a bill was presented for $12,000; but an amendment was adopted reducing the amount to $3,900. It is a very unusual claim, and I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 336) for the relief of Harry Ross Hubbard was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill, as I hastily get its meaning, involves the policy to be pursued by the Government in dealing with the Comptroller General. I ask the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to this matter. Congress has passed a law giving to the Comptroller General considerable authority. He is a sort of a check on appropriations and upon the departments, and a very wise check; but we seem to be dissatisfied, and there may be grounds for the dissatisfaction with some of his decisions. The proposition now is to ignore his decisions, and reject his action, and validate payments made by subordinate officers when the Comptroller General has rejected them. I should like an explanation of this claim before I should be willing to vote for it.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ELIZABETH WOOTEN

The bill (S. 830) for the relief of Elizabeth Wooten was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Elizabeth Wooten, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000 as compensation for injuries received and expenses incurred by reason of having been struck by a United States Army motor truck in Jacksonville, Fla., on the 27th day of May, 1918.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1182) to provide for the protection of forest lands, for the reforestation of denuded areas, for the extension of national forests, and for other purposes, in order to promote the continuous production of timber on lands chiefly suitable therefor was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that is a very important bill. I think we are in favor of it, but we can not consider it under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 56) for the allowance of certain claims for indemnity for spoliations by the French prior to July 31, 1801, as reported by the Court of Claims, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving Congress power to limit or prohibit child labor was announced as next in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 246) for the relief of Margaret I. Varnum was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 354) for the relief of J. H. Toulouse was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether this man was an employee of the Government at the time, and whether the work which he gave in devising these plans was within the line of his employment and within his usual hours of labor?

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ARCHIBALD L. MACNAIR

The bill (S. 825) for the relief of Archibald L. Macnair, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Archibald L. Macnair, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,530.10 as damages for the destruction of his Sopwith airplane by an Army service airplane, March 12, 1922, at Daytona Beach, Fla.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RED CROSS BUILDINGS IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) to authorize the American National Red Cross to continue the use of temporary buildings now erected on square No. 172, Washington, D. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) to authorize the American National Red Cross to continue the use of temporary buildings now erected on square No. 172, Washington, D. C.

Whereas by joint resolution of Congress approved the 22d day of May, 1917, authority was granted to the American National Red Cross to erect temporary structures upon square No. 172, in the city of Washington, D. C., for use in connection with its work in cooperation with the United States Government, provided said buildings erected under said authority should be removed and the site or sites thereof placed in good condition within such time as may hereafter be provided by Congress; and

Whereas the buildings erected pursuant to said resolution are still needed for use in connection with its work in cooperation with the United States Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, given to the central committee of the American National Red Cross to continue the use of such temporary buildings as are now erected upon square No. 172, in the city of Washington, for the use of the American Red Cross in connection with its work in cooperation with the Government of the United States: Provided, That any building or buildings the use of which is extended under this authority shall be removed and the site or sites thereof placed in good condition within such times as may hereafter be provided by Congress: Provided further, That the United States shall be put to no expense of any kind by reason of the exercise of the authority hereby conferred.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING, CINCINNATI, OHIO

The bill (H. R. 4200) to provide for the cleaning of the exterior of the post-office building at Cincinnati, Ohio, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the cleaning of the exterior of the post-office building at Cincinnati, Ohio, in connection with the improvements in the blocks known as Fountain Square, said cleaning to be without expense to the United States and to the entire satisfaction of the representative of the Treasury Department who may be detailed for the final inspection thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND AT WASHINGTON, MO.

The bill (H. R. 6059) authorizing the conveyance to the city of Washington, Mo., of 10 feet of the Federal building site in said city for the extension of the existing public alley through the entire block from Oak to Lafayette Streets, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey to the city of Washington, in the State of Missouri, by quitclaim deed, the north 10 feet of the Federal building site in the said city of Washington, Mo., to be used for an extension of the existing public alley through the entire block from Oak to Lafayette Streets, which said existing public alley now extends but half way through said block, to be used for a public alley and for no other purpose: Provided, however, That the city of Washington shall open said extension to the existing public alley as herein authorized to be granted, and improve and maintain the same as other public alleys of said city are improved and maintained; also, that the city of Washington shall bear all expense incident to the moving of the north curb and the partial rebuilding of the driveway entrance to the Government lot, made necessary by the establishment of the new alley line along the northern boundary of the Federal building site: Provided further, That the city of Washington shall not have the right to sell or convey the land herein authorized to be granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described, and in the event that the said land shall not be used for the purpose of a public alley it shall revert to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The bill (S. 3091) declaring an emergency in respect of certain agricultural commodities, to promote equality between agricultural commodities and other commodities, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSION OF RITTENHOUSE STREET

The bill (S. 2593) for the extension of Rittenhouse Street, in the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 2, to strike out lines 5, 6, and 7, as follows:

Such proceedings shall be governed as to assessment of damages and benefits under the laws of said District provided for the condemnation and extension of streets and avenues.

Also to strike out lines 19, 20, and 21, as follows:

Such estimate, with suitable report as to the cost of such conduit, shall be made to Congress in the next annual report of said commissioners.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the filing by the owners in the surveyor's office of the District of Columbia a dedication of the land necessary to extend Rittenhouse Street from the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. east to Sligo Mill Road, through parcels or tracts of land known as 115/51 and 115/52, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed, within 30 days thereafter, to institute and prosecute proceedings in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia holding a district court, for the condemnation of the land necessary for the remainder of said street, so as to extend same from its present terminus at Blair Road east to Sligo Mill Road in accordance with the approved highway plan for the District of Columbia.

And when the land for said street is so dedicated and condemned, the said street shall be taken and used with its present grade at said railroad tracks with the same intent and meaning as any other street so situated, any law or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding.

And said commissioners are hereby directed to cause to be prepared by the engineer department of the District of Columbia plans and secure estimates looking to the construction of a conduit to create and provide a suitable roadway through said street under the tracks of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDICAL SOCIETY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (H. R. 4122) to amend an act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838, as amended, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838 (6 Stat. L. p. 741), as amended, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"That Doctors George Wythe Cook, William Gerry Morgan, John B. Nichols, John D. Thomas, E. Y. Davidson, Philip S. Roy, A. L. Stavely, Henry C. Macatee, E. G. Sibert, J. Russell Verbrycke, jr., A. W. Boswell, Charles S. White, J. A. Gannon, D. S. Lamb, and Virgil B. Jackson, and such other persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors, be, and they hereby are, constituted a body corporate not for profit, of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of promoting and disseminating medical and surgical knowledge and for no other purpose, and not for the purpose of establishing a medical school or schools.

"SEC. 2. That the Medical Society of the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, empowered to own, mortgage, and convey such property as may be necessary for its purposes, and to make such rules and regulations as it may require, and which may not be repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States.

"SEC. 3. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or annul this act of incorporation of said society."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERNICE HUTCHESON

The bill (H. R. 3148) for the relief of Bernice Hutcheson was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire if the War Department which must have made an examination, recommends the payment of this claim. Since asking the question I see that in the concluding paragraph of the report, on page 3, the Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, refrains from a positive recommendation for or against the claim in question.

Mr. DIAL. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

HUBERT REYNOLDS

The bill (H. R. 5541) for the relief of Hubert Reynolds was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that bill should be explained.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EDWARD T. WILLIAMS

The bill (H. R. 5808) for the relief of Edward T. Williams was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Edward T. Williams, acting postmaster at Niagara Falls, N. Y., in the total sum of $87,932.77, due the United States on account of losses as the result of burglary on June 2, 1920, as follows: Postal funds, $4,306.27; postage stamps, $32,734.27; 8,044 war savings stamps, at $4.17 each, $33,543.48; 20,225 thrift stamps, at 25 cents each, $5,056.25; and internal revenue stamps, $12,292.50.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this bill is for the relief of the postmaster at Niagara Falls, or, rather, the man who was acting as postmaster, Mr. Edward T. Williams, for a total of $87,932.77, that being the amount stolen from the office; in postal funds, $4,306.27; postage stamps, $32,000; 8,044 war savings stamps, at $4.17 each, a total of $33,000; 20,225 thrift stamps, at 25 cents each, $5,056.25; and internal revenue stamps amounting to $12,392.50.

This bill has passed the House. It would seem that the theft occurred at this office through no negligence on the part of the postmaster. Under the regulations of the department the postmaster is held liable for this amount. Obviously, it is utterly impossible for him to pay $87,000 into the Federal Treasury. This bill is for the purpose of relieving him of that liability. It was a case of robbery.

Mr. KING. They could have had burglary insurance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Post Office Department does not carry burglary insurance.

Mr. McKELLAR. The postmaster could not have been required to take out insurance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. It is one of those unfortunate cases that sometimes happen, and under the statutes the postmaster is responsible.

Mr. KING. Was it prudent to keep such a large amount on hand?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Niagara Falls is a city of 40,000 or 50,000 inhabitants, and that amount of postage stamps is required to be kept on hand in the office.

Mr. DIAL. Has anyone been arrested or prosecuted in connection with the matter?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not informed as to that. Of course, that is a matter in the hands, in the first instance, of the post-office inspectors, and if they can possibly trace the thief, the testimony is turned over to the United States attorney, and the Senator knows that the arm of the Federal Government is quite long in cases of this kind. They keep after the case until the man is found, and sometimes it takes years.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suppose the postmaster has not paid the money, but this is merely to relieve him from doing it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the idea.

Mr. BROOKHART. There were arrests and convictions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Iowa prompts me that there were arrests and convictions. I was not familiar with that side of the question.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREAT LAKES ENGINEERING WORKS

The bill (S. 698) for the relief of the Great Lakes Engineering Works was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. This is merely to refer to the Court of Claims for adjudication a claim for damages alleged to have grown out of a collision between a United States steamship and a steamship belonging to the Great Lakes Engineering Works. It seems to be appropriate to refer it to the Court of Claims for adjudication, if the Senator will withdraw his objection to its consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest also the absence, on account of serious illness, of the Senator who introduced the bill. He is not here to look after it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator who reported the bill is absent, and requested me to look after it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it ought to be passed.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I had not read far enough down to see where it was stated that it would be referred to the Court of Claims. I thought it was to be adjusted out of court. I am very much in favor of referring cases to the court, and I withdraw my objection.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Great Lakes Engineering Works, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, with its principal place of business in the city of Detroit, in said State, owner of the steamship Frank H. Goodyear, and certain docks on the Detroit River, at Ecorse, Mich., against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the U. S. S. Isla de Luzon and said steamship Frank H. Goodyear on May 24, 1917, in the Detroit River, at Ecorse, Mich., may be sued for by the Great Lakes Engineering Works in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the Great Lakes Engineering Works, or against the Great Lakes Engineering Works in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by the order of said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCIAL UNION ASSURANCE CO. (LTD.) AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 1975) for the relief of the Commercial Union Assurance Co. (Ltd.), Federal Insurance Co., American & Foreign Marine Insurance Co., Queen Insurance Co. of America, Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., United States Lloyds, and the St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem, without interest, thirteen 4 per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness Nos. 12033, 12034, 12035, 12036, 12037, 12038, 12039, 12040, 12256, 12257, 12258, 12259, and 12260, of the denomination of $1,000 each, dated August 20, 1918, and maturing July 15, 1919, without presentation of such certificates of indebtedness, which have been lost, stolen, or destroyed, and to pay, from the proceeds of such redemption, to the following companies the respective sums set after their names: Commercial Union Assurance Co. (Ltd.), $2,600; Federal Insurance Co., $2,600; American & Foreign Marine Insurance Co., $1,950; Queen Insurance Co. of America., $1,950; Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., $1,820; United States Lloyds, $1,560; St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co., $520; a total sum of $13,000: Provided, That the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented and paid: And provided further, That the said Commercial Union Assurance Co. (Ltd.), Federal Insurance Co., American & Foreign Marine Insurance Co., Queen Insurance Co. of America, Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., United States Lloyds, and the St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co. shall first file in the Treasury Department of the United States a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates of indebtedness, in such form and with such sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed certificates of indebtedness hereinbefore described.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Delaware please explain the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this is a bill to reimburse certain insurance companies for the losses of United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness, a certain number set up in the bill.

Under the facts in the case the securities in question were shipped by one of the Federal reserve banks to the Treasury Department here and were lost in transit. They were insured with the Treasury Department by the original owners of these certificates, and the Treasury Department paid the loss. Then the Treasury Department was reimbursed by the several insurance companies named, and they were therefore subrogated to the rights of the Treasury Department, which had paid for these certificates of indebtedness which were lost. But the certificates are still outstanding evidences of debt against the United States, and therefore by subrogation belong to the subinsurers, and have not yet been paid, are owed by the United States, and are owned by these insurance companies by the doctrine of subrogation. They will give bond in double the sum of the bonds to the Federal Government, in the event of these securities turning up hereafter, and the bill is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McKELLAR. That means that it will not cost the insurance companies anything? As I understand, they insured the safe delivery of the bonds?

Mr. BAYARD. The Government insured the safe delivery of the bonds, and reinsured themselves with the insurance companies. So the insurance companies have been subrogated as owners of these bonds.

Mr. KING. Did they pay the Government?

Mr. BAYARD. They paid the Government. The Government paid the original owners of the bonds, and then the Government called upon the insurance companies, who were the subinsurers of the Government, which had just insured the shippers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the bill provide that if these bonds turn up at any time——

Mr. BAYARD. There is a provision in the bill indemnifying the Government in case they turn up. Every precaution is taken. There have been a number of these cases in the last two or three years, since the issue of the war securities. This is another case of subrogation. It has all been gone over by the Secretary of the Treasury, who recommends the passage of this bill, and who helped to draw the particular terms of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It looks like an unusual proceeding. The Government insures itself against loss in the transportation of bonds, and the insurance companies pay the Government, and then the Government pays the insurance companies. The Government might still not have insured in the first place.

Mr. BAYARD. The bonds did not belong to the Government in the first place. They were shipped by one of the Federal reserve banks to the Treasury Department here, but they were not in the ownership of the Government. They were shipped on account of other parties, and were insured by the Government. The Government had reinsured those, as a precaution against loss, and then the Government paid the original shippers the face value of the bonds, and then collected from the subinsurers, and by the doctrine of subrogation the subinsurers became the owners of the bonds, which are still outstanding, which are still owing.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator a question. I do not understand this case yet. As I understand, the bonds were lost, and the Government of the United States paid in cash the par value of the bonds, plus accumulated interest.

Mr. BAYARD. Not interest.

Mr. KING. Paid for the bonds, then. The bill calls for the payment of the amount which the Government has already paid to the insurance companies, so the Government will make two payments, though it has received but one.

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no. The Government received payment for the bonds when it issued them. Do not forget that. These bonds were issued once by the Government, and the Government received par for the bonds, and the owners of the bonds shipped them from the Federal reserve bank to the Treasury Department here, and they were lost in transit. But the Government had insured the safe delivery of those bonds, and they not having been delivered—in fact, being lost—the Government then paid the shippers of the bonds, but it had reinsured itself in the meantime, and collected that money, which was paid to the shipper, from the reinsurers, who in turn became subrogated as owners of those bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. Suppose the bona fide owner of those bonds turns up and demands from the Government that they pay him? Then the Government will be paying for them twice, certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I tried to explain to the Senator that these insurance companies give bond in twice the amount of the bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, the insurance company proceeds on the theory that the bonds have been lost permanently and will not come into the hands of an innocent holder.

Mr. BAYARD. And the Government owes the money on them. They are fully indemnified under the terms of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. How long ago did this happen? It seems to me they might wait awhile.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not remember the exact date.

Mr. ROBINSON. Shipment was made July 1, 1919, according to the report.

Mr. BAYARD. And the bonds have matured.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the situation to be that these were original Government bonds issued by the Government, sold to A, B, and C, and that A, B, and C took the bonds to the Federal reserve bank to be sent on to Washington. The Federal reserve bank insured the bonds——

Mr. BAYARD. With the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not suppose so. The Federal reserve bank is responsible to the shipper for the bonds. They took out insurance to protect themselves. The Government did not actually insure them, but the Federal reserve bank was liable for the delivery of the bonds, and the bank took out insurance, and then when the bonds were lost the bank had to pay the owners of the bonds and call on the insurance company to reimburse them.

Mr. BAYARD. No. What happened was that the insurance was taken by the Federal Government because they were sent by mail.

Mr. McKELLAR. What sort of bond was given, a surety-company bond?

Mr. BAYARD. It is the regular bond provided in similar cases by Government authority.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may be merely a private bond.

Mr. BAYARD. I imagine not.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me it is bad business unless the bond is beyond question. If it is merely an individual bond, it may not be much security. I am talking about the bond they have offered for security.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is all subject to approval of the Treasury Department. I think the bill is all right. The next bill is of the same character.

Mr. BAYARD. The bill is similar except the facts are not quite the same. The principle involved is the same exactly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCIAL UNION ASSURANCE CO. (LTD.), AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 1976) for the relief of the Commercial Union Assurance Co. (Ltd.), Federal Insurance Co., American & Foreign Marine Insurance Co., Queen Insurance Co. of America, Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co., and the United States Lloyds was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem, without interest, two 4½ per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness Nos. 7012 and 7013 of the denomination of $5,000 each, dated April 10, 1918, and maturing July 9, 1918, without presentation of such certificates of indebtedness, which have been lost, stolen, or destroyed, and to pay from the proceeds of such redemption to the following companies the respective sums set after their names: Commercial Union Assurance Co. (Ltd.), $2,000; Federal Insurance Co., $2,000; American & Foreign Marine Insurance Co., $1,500; Queen Insurance Co. of America, $1,500; Firemen's Fund Insurance Co., $1,400; St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co., $400; and United States Lloyds, $1,200; a total sum of $10,000: Provided, That the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented for payment: Provided further, That the said Commercial Union Assurance Co. (Ltd.), the Federal Insurance Co., the American & Foreign Marine Insurance Co., the Queen Insurance Co. of America, the Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., the St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co., and the United States Lloyds, shall first file in the Treasury Department of the United States a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates of indebtedness, in such form and with such sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed certificates of indebtedness hereinbefore described.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suppose the same principle is involved here that was involved in the bill just passed?

Mr. BAYARD. The same principle is involved, but on a different state of facts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERLEY MORSE & CO.

The bill (S. 2124) for the relief of Perley Morse & Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FREDERIC K. LONG

The bill (S. 2022) to authorize the President to reconsider the case of Frederic K. Long and to reappoint him a captain in the Regular Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to reconsider the record of trial of Frederic K. Long, who on March 19, 1924, while a captain of Infantry in the Regular Army, was dismissed the service of the United States pursuant to a sentence adjudged by general court-martial; and if upon reconsideration of said record of trial in connection with the record of service of said Frederic K. Long, including his service during the World War, the President shall determine that the ends of justice and discipline and the public interest would be served better by loss of a certain number of files in military rank and in position on the promotion list than by permanent separation from the military service, the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to reappoint said Frederic K. Long a captain of Infantry in the Regular Army, to fill the next or any subsequent vacancy in the grade of captain, with such date of rank not earlier than his former date of rank and such place upon the promotion list not above his former place upon that list as to the President may seem just and advisable.

Mr. KING. I would like to understand the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is a case which appealed to the Committee on Military Affairs very strongly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The officer was found guilty of having failed to pay his obligations on several occasions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. This officer served during the war in France. He was found guilty since the war—he was still in the regular service—of having failed to pay his just obligations after having promised on several occasions in writing to do so. He was finally court-martialed and was sentenced to be dismissed from the service. Before the papers in the case reached the Secretary of War for approval, a former Assistant Secretary of War, the Hon. J. M. WAINWRIGHT, now a Member of the House of Representatives, visited in person the Secretary of War, and asked that official if he would hold the papers on his desk before the dismissal was approved in order that he, Mr. WAINWRIGHT, might have an opportunity to give him, the Secretary of War, some additional information about the officer. The Secretary of War agreed to do that, and agreed to do it in perfectly good faith, especially because Mr. WAINWRIGHT served with this man in France and knew his military record from close, constant daily observation.

Unfortunately the papers passed over Secretary Weeks's desk with his approval without his having had his attention recalled to the fact that he was to see Mr. WAINWRIGHT. When it was discovered, the Secretary of War was very much aggrieved at his own failure to give the supplemental hearing, as it were, to former Assistant Secretary WAINWRIGHT, who incidentally had been this officers' comrade in France. Upon considering the case the Secretary of War agreed with Mr. WAINWRIGHT to support a bill which might be introduced and passed by the Congress, the effect of which would be to reopen the case and give a chance for the additional testimony to be introduced. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it cause for dismissal that an officer does not pay his debts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill does not reinstate the officer?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not.

Mr. ROBINSON. It merely authorizes the President to look into the facts with a view of reinstating him if the circumstances justify that action?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the entire purpose of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNDERWOOD TYPEWRITER CO. AND FRANK P. TROTT

The bill (H. R. 4647) for the relief of the Underwood Typewriter Co. and Frank P. Trott was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay $707.50 from the appropriations originally applicable to the Underwood Typewriter Co. for 17 Underwood typewriters delivered to various field offices of the General Land Office during the fiscal year 1921, valued at $1,147.50, less the value of 17 unserviceable typewriters taken in exchange, valued at $400, claims for which were disallowed by the Auditor for the Interior Department because of the act of May 29, 1920 (41 Stat. L. p. 688).

That the Comptroller General be, and is hereby, directed to allow credit in the accounts of Frank P. Trott, United States surveyor general of Arizona, the sum of $42.50, being the amount suspended by the Comptroller General in the settlement of his accounts for the period October 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921, under the appropriation, "Deposits by individuals for surveying public lands," for payment to the Underwood Typewriter Co. for one Underwood typewriter.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO.

The bill (H. R. 6012) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to ascertain the cost to the Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, and the amounts expended by it from December 1, 1906, to November 30, 1907, in closing and controlling the break in the Colorado River, and to render judgment therefor, as herein provided, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Whereas at the request of President Roosevelt and under the stress of great emergency, from December 1, 1906, to November 30, 1907, the Southern Pacific Co. closed and controlled the break in the Colorado River and thereby prevented the overflow and destruction of 1,214,000 acres of irrigable land in the Imperial Valley in southern California and saved to the Government the Laguna Dam and the Yuma reclamation project connected therewith in Arizona as well as thousands of acres of other Government land along the Colorado River: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, against the United States for reimbursement and repayment to such company of the cost to said company and the amounts expended by it from December 1, 1906, to November 30, 1907, in closing and controlling the break in the Colorado River, be, and such claim is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, and full jurisdiction is hereby vested in said court to ascertain the amounts actually expended and the actual costs incurred by the said Southern Pacific Co. in closing and controlling said break within said period and to render judgment in favor of said Southern Pacific Co. and against the United States of America for such aggregate amounts, less such proportion of such expenditures and costs as would be fair and reasonable to be deducted as said company's share of such expenditures and costs and the share of any subsidiary corporation of said Southern Pacific Co., because of the amount and probable value of the land and improvements thereon belonging at the time to said company or any subsidiary corporation of said Southern Pacific Co., and which in the opinion of said court were saved by the closing and controlling of said break, as compared with the amount and probable value of the other land, improvements, and other property belonging at the time to the United States Government and occupants and settlers and exclusive of railroad holdings and holdings of any subsidiary corporation of said Southern Pacific Co. which in the opinion of said court were also saved by the closing and controlling of said break; with the right of appeal to both parties, and no statute of limitations shall apply to the right of recovery by said claimant. In ascertaining and determining aforesaid costs, expenses, facts, and matters the court may receive and consider all papers, depositions, records, correspondence, and documents heretofore at any time filed in Congress or with committees thereof and in the executive departments of the Government, together with any other evidence offered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ought to object to the bill because it renders judgment.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator withhold his objection until the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] may offer an explanation? I think we considered a similar bill favorably at the former session.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. A bill to the same effect was introduced at the last session and was referred to the Committee on Claims, which reported unanimously in favor of its passage. I introduced a bill of this character at this session. The immediate bill now before the Senate was introduced in the House, favorably reported, and came to us here. It is a most meritorious bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Several Senators around me tell me that it was before the Senate and was gone into very carefully, so I withdraw my objection, although I do not think the Court of Claims ought to be allowed to render judgment.

Mr. ROBINSON. This claim has been pending before the Congress for a great many years. It has been investigated and reinvestigated by the committees in both Houses of Congress, and many favorable recommendations have been made respecting the claim. I believe the bill ought to pass. I think, in good faith, considering the circumstances under which the claim arose, that it is the duty of the Government to make arrangements to see that it is promptly adjudicated and finally paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

ALBERT O. TUCKER.

The bill (S. 2035) for the relief of Albert O. Tucker was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL and Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I hope the Senators will withhold their objection until I can make a brief explanation.

This is a bill for the relief of Albert O. Tucker. It is a most meritorious case. This man is 87 years old. He is in very destitute and feeble condition. Owing to the fact that he has been unable to submit evidence to the effect that he was unable to return to duty because of wounds and injuries, or disease received or contracted in line of duty, the War Department is unable to issue a discharge to him. An effort has been made to locate the doctor who attended him during the illness, or some one who could substantiate his testimony, but without success. The physician who attended him has no doubt been dead for a long time.

In view of his age and pitiable condition the committee was of the opinion that he should be given the benefit of any doubt that may exist as to his record, and that he should receive a pension for the few remaining years of his life. I think it is the duty of the Senate at least to allow him to have an honorable discharge, as there is no back pension involved.

Mr. KING. I find in the report which has been submitted the following language:

> On which date it is shown that he left his company while on the march and did not return. Prisoner-of-war records show that he was taken prisoner at Suffolk, Va., July 8, 1863; that he was confined at Richmond, Va., July 10, 1863; that he was paroled at City Point, Va., July 14, 1863; that he reported at Camp Parole, Md., July 15, 1863, and that he deserted from that camp July 23, 1863.

It looks as though he had the habit of deserting, because he left twice in a month.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator read further?

Mr. KING. If there is anything the Senator wants to read, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. CAMERON. I read further:

> In January, 1865, he went to Augusta, Me.——

Mr. KING. The Senator asked me to go on further. Of course, he meant in the same paragraph?

Mr. CAMERON. I would be very glad to have the Senator read that paragraph.

Mr. KING. It reads as follows:

> Nothing has been found of record to show that Tucker ever returned to his command or notified the military authorities of his whereabouts or the cause of his absence.

That is confirmatory evidence of desertion. I presume the Senator wants to read the affiant's statement?

Mr. CAMERON. I do.

Mr. KING. It is ex parte.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has already been made, and the bill will go over.

OOSTANAULA RIVER BRIDGE, GEORGIA

The bill (S. 3025) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Oostanaula River, in Gordon County, Ga., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 3, to strike out the words "county of Gordon, in the State of Georgia," and insert in lieu thereof the words "Highway Department of Georgia," and on page 2, after line 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

> SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Highway Department of Georgia, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Oostanaula River, in Gordon County, Ga., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, on the road between Calhoun, Gordon County, Ga., and Dalton, Whitfield County, Ga., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NUMBER OF NATIONALS ADMITTED INTO THE UNITED STATES

The resolution (S. Res. 202) directing the Secretary of Labor to furnish information as to number of nationals admitted into the United States during the past 12 months was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIS. The resolution relates to immigration matters that have already been passed upon. I do not think any good purpose would be served by its passage. I suggest that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

REFUNDS TO WORLD WAR VETERANS ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2397) to provide for refunds to veterans of the World War of certain amounts paid by them under Federal irrigation projects, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 9, after the word "time," to strike out "prior to the date of passage of this act" and to insert "since April 6, 1917"; and in line 14, after the word "after," to strike out "April 1, 1917," so as to read:

> SEC. 2. (a) Any veteran—who at any time since April 6, 1917, has made entry upon a farm unit within a Federal irrigation project under the reclamation law and (1) who no longer retains such entry because of cancellation by, or relinquishment to, the United States, or (2) who, prior to receipt by him of a final certificate in respect of such entry, but in no case more than one year after the date of passage of this act, desires to relinquish such entry—may, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, file application for the refund provided in subdivision (b). A veteran who has been compensated, in cash or otherwise, for any such relinquishment shall not be entitled to the benefits of this act, and before payment of such refund the Secretary of the Interior, under such regulations as he may prescribe, shall require proof that the veteran has not been so compensated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I should like the Senator from Wyoming, who introduced the bill, to explain its terms.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to refund to veterans of the World War such moneys as they have paid on construction charges on claims selected by them on reclamation projects. Only in cases where they have failed to finish their proof on those projects are they allowed or entitled under the bill to a refund of the original payments. The bill does not allow them any refund for the maintenance charges or the overhead charges; it does not propose to return to the veteran the cost of any improvements that he may have put on the land. It merely proposes to return the original amount paid in construction charges where he has failed to finish his proof and to receive title to the land.

Under the circumstances it is inconceivable that the Government would want to profit on the veterans of the World War. In case the money is returned to the veteran the bill provides by an amendment that that shall be deemed a relinquishment of all his rights, which, of course, means that the Government still holds the land and still owns the water rights that go with the land. The Government will not be out a single cent.

The land is improved to whatever extent the veteran has contributed improvements; but it is not proposed that there shall be any refund because of improvements in the shape of houses, fences, and plowing and planting. All of these improvements are to be relinquished and abandoned to the Government, and I repeat there is to be no return of overhead and maintenance charges.

Mr. KING. I was about to ask the Senator, would it not be better to provide for an extension of the time within which to make payments, to encourage the veteran to acquire a home by giving him advantageous terms, than to encourage him by this law to abandon the property and receive back the pittance which he has paid to the Government?

Mr. KENDRICK. That arrangement is now proposed by legislation which, I hope, will shortly come before the Senate, which provides for an extension of time, and in some cases, I believe, for deductions from the original price of the land and the water rights; but in the cases covered by this bill—and there are not many of them; they are very limited—the veterans have forsaken the land and have abandoned the right to it because, in most instances, of sickness or ill health of themselves or their families. Under no circumstances can the Government suffer any loss as a consequence of such an abandonment, and, as I have already said, it seems inconceivable that the Government should profit at the expense of these veterans.

Mr. KING. Has the Secretary of the Interior approved this proposed legislation?

Mr. KENDRICK. The Secretary of the Interior approves of it with the amendments which have been reported by the committee.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to know whether or not if this bill be passed it would establish a precedent for treating others in the same position in like manner and thus extending the principle? Of course, I want to be kind to the veterans, but I am afraid there is a good deal of harm sometimes done in the name of the veterans.

Mr. KENDRICK. This bill applies only to veterans, and in any event, as I have already said, not many of them will be involved. The passage of the bill would not establish a dangerous precedent, because in the majority of the cases the veterans are benefited more directly or materially by maintaining their right to the land and making final proof; but where they have found it impossible to do that and have relinquished all their rights, and although they have actually given days and weeks and months of hard work to improving it and have in many cases made physical improvements upon the land, they are willing to sacrifice all that and leave the land, it seems only just and fair to them that they should be allowed to have the original investment in the land returned to them. Of course, they would not abandon the land and leave it through choice, but where they find it necessary to do so it seems unfair to them to insist that the Reclamation Service should profit by retaining the pitiful amount that they have invested in the property.

Mr. DIAL. Does this bill apply to all reclamation projects?

Mr. KENDRICK. It applies only to reclamation projects; and I dare say it would not involve to exceed from 15 to 20 veterans all told.

Mr. DIAL. Of course if those are all which are to be included not much harm could happen. I do not desire, however, that we shall establish a precedent which might be extended to others.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation was, in section 2, page 3, line 2, after the word "authorized," to strike out the words "and directed" and to insert "to investigate the facts and, in his discretion"; and in line 7, after the word "such," to strike out the word "suit" and to insert "unit. Every such refund so approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid from the appropriation for the project on which the entry in question was made," so as to make the clause read:

(b) Upon receipt of such application the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to investigate the facts and, in his discretion, to pay as a refund to any such veteran entitled thereto, a sum equal to all amounts paid to the United States by such veteran, or for his account, as construction charges and as interest and penalties on such charges in respect of such unit. Every such refund so approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid from the appropriation for the project on which the entry in question was made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 18, after the word "shall," to strike out the word "relinquish" and to insert "be deemed thereby to have relinquished," so as to make the clause read:

(b) A veteran (or his estate) accepting in respect of any farm unit the benefits of this act shall be deemed thereby to have relinquished, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, all right, title, or interest of such veteran (or estate) in such farm unit and any improvements thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 6, to strike out as follows:

SEC. 6. There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the reclamation fund established under the reclamation law, an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 106) for the relief of Robert F. Hamilton was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MODIFICATION OF CERTAIN BARGE CONTRACTS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 102) authorizing the Secretary of War to modify certain contracts entered into for the sale of boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities intended for operation upon the New York State Barge Canal was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah to withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. KING. I will withhold it in order that the Senator may make an explanation of the joint resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this joint resolution has to do with an unusual situation. It was examined into by the Military Affairs Committee in extensive hearings, which finally resulted in a unanimous report by the committee in favor of this measure. I may say that my colleague [Mr. COPELAND] has also examined it and thoroughly approves of this measure.

During the war the United States Railroad Administration established a line of barges on the New York State Barge Canal. As a matter of fact, the boats themselves were not finished until just about the time the war ended, but the boats were installed and the service started for the purpose of relieving the traffic congestion on the railroads, which at that time were greatly overburdened.

After the war was over the Railroad Administration transferred to the War Department the ownership of these barges, and the War Department proceeded to operate them as a Government undertaking on the New York Canal. In the transportation act passed, as I recall, in 1920, a provision was inserted by Congress directing the Secretary of War to sell these barges and cease governmental operation on the New York canals. The Secretary of War at that time advertised for bids for this group of boats. The War Department believed that they were worth more than a million dollars. They were built at war-time costs. The highest bid that was received as a result of the first advertisement was in the neighborhood of $450,000 from a certain company, but the conditions of the bid were not as favorable as even that might seem, because there was to be a cash payment of only 33⅓ per cent, and then installment payments extending over a good many months thereafter.

The War Department was dissatisfied with the bids and ordered another advertisement. Upon that advertisement the highest bid, instead of being $450,000, was $300,000. It then became apparent to the War Department that by advertising for bids they could not get responsible bidders to offer anything like the sum which had been originally expended on these barges by the Railroad Administration.

Finally the War Department persuaded a syndicate of gentlemen, most of them residing in New York, to purchase these boats on a contract under which they were to pay the principal sum of $1,000,000—$100,000 down and $150,000 to be secured by bonds, and the remainder to be paid in 72 equal monthly installments, the installments to run over 6 years.

Mr. KING. With interest?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I think not. The boats were turned over to the company, and the company has been struggling with the operation ever since. They have had much the same experience as the Warrior and Mississippi River barge lines have had, which have been run by the War Department itself. As a matter of fact, Colonel Ashburn, the head of inland waterways transportation on behalf of the War Department, has kept very close track of the operations of this company. The fact of the matter is the company has paid in $100,000 in cash and has paid something like $58,000 in interest and installments, and the bonding companies can be compelled to pay $150,000 more. The Government to-day is in a position to collect, all told, the principal sum of about $306,000.

The company has lost money steadily. Last year it lost $40,000 over and above its income. It simply can not meet the terms of the contract. They paid too much for the boats, and they are greatly overcapitalized, $1,000,000 being the capitalization. Their accounts have been audited twice by the War Department, and their entire business operations have been examined by Colonel Ashburn, who has had a very similar experience on the Warrior and the Mississippi Rivers.

The question arises now, Shall the Government collect from the bonding companies $150,000 and take back the boats? If it does so, it will have collected altogether $306,000, which is more money than was bid after public advertisement at the second bidding. Shall the Government take back the boats, and because the War Department, under the statute, can not operate them, endeavor to dispose of them all over again?

This bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to modify that original contract. He has told us that he has no right under the statute to make any modification, but desires to draft a new contract with these people, who have done their level best to live up to the old one, but who have lost everything they put in, potentially at least. Under no circumstances, however, shall the Government accept as a principal sum less than $500,000 under a modified contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does that mean in addition to the $158,000 that it has already received in principal and interest?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amount is inclusive.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the condition of the company that entered into this contract with the Government?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The condition of their business, perhaps, may be of interest. The boats have been running full, east and west, on the barge canal; but, unfortunately, the boats were not properly designed—they were built by the Government originally—and they are not the most practical type of boats. The company has not been able to handle them in an economical manner, in addition to which the expenses of operating them have been much higher than was ever supposed would be the case. Their experience has been the same as that which Colonel Ashburn has had with the Warrior and Mississippi River boats. They have carried two-thirds of all the through freight passing over the barge canal between New York and Buffalo both ways. If they are taken off the canal by reason of the War Department taking the boats away from them, and leaving them penniless in the meantime, the shippers on the canal will be greatly inconvenienced.

The canal is slowly coming into its own. The business of barge transportation, apparently, is a new thing in the United States, and those who go into it have bitter experiences for the first two or three years. That has been the case on the lower Mississippi, on the Warrior, on the upper Mississippi, on the Ohio, on the intercoastal canal, and on the barge canal.

Mr. McKELLAR. Conditions on the lower Mississippi are improving greatly at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Our people are beginning to learn the "trick of the trade" and how to run barge lines for transportation purposes.

These people are so terribly overcapitalized that they can not pay these installments and the interest. If we will permit them to reduce their capitalization by modifying the contract, there is not the slightest doubt that they can live and continue to serve the shippers of the West. Half the stuff they carry is wheat; 111,000 tons of wheat were brought from Buffalo to New York during the last canal season. If they are cut off by reason of the recapture of the barges by the Government, those shippers are the losers as well as these unfortunate gentlemen who in perfect good faith went into this enterprise but bid much too high for the property.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take it that they have paid no dividends since they have had the boats?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, they have not had a penny of dividends—nothing. The accounts have been carefully audited by the War Department. We had before us Colonel Ashburn, who described the difficulties of starting barge-line transportation.

The Secretary of War has been consulted about this matter and is heartily in favor of giving these people a chance to live. Otherwise the barges will come back to the Government, and the Government can not use them, and no one will ever pay the Government anything like what these people attempted to pay.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, what are the net assets of this concern?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Their statement is found on page 3 of the report.

Mr. FLETCHER. The statement is in the report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is quite an extended statement, and is the result of a double audit by the War Department itself. The War Department gives them a clean bill of health on their accounts, and also a clean bill of health as to the condition in which they have maintained this equipment. The equipment to-day is in what might be termed "apple-pie order."

Mr. HOWELL. The point I am arriving at is this: Are they able to pay their obligations to the Government, assuming that their property is sold in the open market?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; it would not bring anything.

Mr. HOWELL. Are their assets sufficient to pay the indebtedness to the Government were the property sold in the open market?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; they could not pay. The Government would have to take back the property. They have fallen down on the contract. That is what has happened.

Mr. WARREN. Their sole assets are these boats.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Government has a lien on the boats; and when these people can not meet the terms of their contract, which they should never have entered into, the Government takes back the boats.

Mr. HOWELL. But have they not the notes of this corporation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but the Government can not collect.

Mr. HOWELL. Does the Senator mean that they have no assets outside of these boats?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; they have not, as a corporation. The corporation was formed for this one purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. The corporation was formed for the purpose of making this purchase, and this comprises their whole property. If they are not allowed to do this, the Government will have to take back all the boats, and the Government is not in a position to operate that line successfully. It seems that this is the only chance for the Government to realize anything out of it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to object to the consideration of this joint resolution, but I suggest for the consideration of the Senator from New York, whether he might be willing to let it go over until there can be joint consideration of this measure, and another bill which was reported from the Committee on Commerce to-day, proposing absolutely the opposite policy with reference to the Mississippi barge line?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Mississippi barge line is owned and operated by the Government.

Mr. WILLIS. Precisely; I understand that. The disposition which is proposed here is, of course, exactly the opposite policy from that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no analogy between the two cases. I am familiar with that bill also. That bill is to authorize the Government, which owns and operates the Warrior-Mississippi barges, to form a corporation the stock of which shall all be owned by the Government, and that the undertaking thereafter shall be operated by a Government-owned corporation. This is not a Government-owned corporation.

Mr. WILLIS. Precisely; and, as the Senator suggests, if the Government should foreclose under the rights it now has, it would have the boats, and we would have the same situation that exists in the other case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all, because the law forbids the Government operating any boats on the New York Barge Canal under any circumstances.

Mr. WILLIS. The State law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the Federal law. The people of the State of New York never will permit the United States Government to use their canal in a Government operation, and thereby keep all New York citizens off of it, because the people of New York built that canal, and they own it. They paid $167,000,000 for it, but it is free of toll for any citizen of the country. There is no analogy between the two cases.

Mr. WILLIS. It seems to me there ought to be.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There can not be.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state again what tonnage passed through that canal over this barge line?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Two hundred and forty thousand tons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Whereas in pursuance of Public Resolution No. 62, approved February 27, 1921, the Secretary of War sold all boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities originally intended for the New York Barge Canal to a syndicate which organized the New York Canal & Great Lakes Corporation, and transferred the aforementioned transportation facilities purchased thereto; and to a syndicate which organized the Baltimore, Philadelphia & Southern Transportation Corporation and transferred the transportation facilities purchased thereto, for an aggregate sum of $1,400,000; and

Whereas the Inland Steamship Co., the successor to the Baltimore, Philadelphia & Southern Transportation Corporation, did, on the 14th day of November, 1922, for various considerations, transfer by lease or otherwise, all of its boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities to the New York Canal & Great Lakes Coporation; and

Whereas the New York Canal & Great Lakes Corporation has been actively engaged in transportation business with said transportation facilities upon the New York Canal, and has made strenuous efforts, and expended considerable money in endeavoring to establish paying transportation facilities upon such canal; and

Whereas the War Department has caused to be made two complete audits of the affairs of said company, and an inspection of all vessels now in the possession of such corporations, and finds that such audits and inspection indicate a sincere and earnest effort on the part of the New York & Great Lakes Corporation to carry out the terms of its contracts; and

Whereas such audits have demonstrated the practical impossibility of said New York Canal & Great Lakes Corporation being able to put its boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on a paying basis, with such a capital charge against them; and

Whereas the provisions of Public Resolution No. 62, approved February 27, 1921, preclude the operation of such boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities by the Secretary of War, or any other agency of the United States upon the New York Canal; and

Whereas such boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities are not suitable for operation upon any other navigable waters upon which the Inland and Coastwise Waterways Service, War Department, is conducting operations for the Secretary of War, in accordance with the transportation act, 1920; and

Whereas the bid of the syndicate which purchased three-fourths of the tugs, barges, boats, and other facilities actually constructed for operation on the New York Barge Canal was $699,900 in excess of the nearest competing bid, to wit, that of the Knickerbocker Marine Navigation Co., opened May 16, 1921, after a campaign of country-wide advertising, of $300,100; and

Whereas the controlling stockholders in the New York Canal and Great Lakes Corporation, and the Inland Steamship Co., the successor to the Baltimore, Philadelphia & Southern Transportion Co., are to all intents and purposes the same; and

Whereas Congress has declared its policy in section 500, transportation act, to be the promotion, encouragement, and development of water transportation service and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States, and the fostering and preservation in full vigor of both rail and water transportation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to so modify the terms of all contracts and supplements thereto that have been entered into by the United States regarding the sale of boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities intended for operation on the New York State Barge Canal by such a new contract or contracts as will enable the New York Canal and Great Lakes Corporation to operate the boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities sold under the terms of Public Resolution No. 62, 1921, with a reasonable prospect of success: Provided, That the terms of sale shall not be so modified in any manner or condition as to result in the acceptance by the United States of a principal sum of money less than $500,000.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2590) to amend sections 1, 3, and 6 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment," was announced as next in order.

Mr. OWEN. Let that go over.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that objection a moment?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I made the point against the bill because it will take a long time to dispose of it.

Mr. FESS. But will the Senator withhold it for just one minute?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly; I withhold it for a moment.

Mr. FESS. This is a continuation of the act passed June 2, 1920. It was a permanent law as it left the House. The Senate limited it to four years. The law expires on the 30th of next month. Unless we ratify what the House did a few days ago this entire work, which has operated in 36 States, will be discontinued.

I do not think the Senate desires to defeat the continuation of the act. If it is objected to, I shall take the earliest opportunity to move to bring it before the Senate, because it is very important.

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

ROBERT F. HAMILTON

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I ask to return to Senate bill 106, Order of Business 448, for the relief of Robert F. Hamilton. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] objected to the consideration of this bill, but he has very kindly agreed to withdraw his objection. The bill will take only a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to return to Order of Business 448. Is there objection?

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I thought this was a desertion case, but I find it is not, and I therefore withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives Robert F. Hamilton, late a private in Company M, Tenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said organization on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1864: Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7111) to promote American agriculture by making more extensively available and by expanding the service now rendered by the Department of Agriculture in gathering and disseminating information regarding agricultural production, competition, and demand in foreign countries in promoting the sale of farm products abroad, and in other ways, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

J. F. ROWELL

The bill (S. 2526) providing for an allotment of lands from the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian Reservation, Okla., to J. F. Rowell, an enrolled member of the Kiowa Tribe, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That in order to give effect to the act of Congress of April 4, 1910 (36 Stat. L. p. 280), directing an allotment to James F. Rowell, an intermarried and enrolled member of the Kiowa Tribe of Indians, Oklahoma, who has heretofore received no allotment of land, or money settlement in lieu of such allotment, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make an allotment of 160 acres of land to James F. Rowell out of the remaining lands embraced in the former Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian Reservation, Okla., including land reserved for agency, subagency, and school purposes, no longer needed for administration of the Kiowa Agency, should it appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the aforesaid lands selected be not worth more than $25 per acre, after appraisement: Provided, That such selection shall be made within 90 days after the passage of this act, by and with the advice and consent of the superintendent of the Kiowa Indian Agency, and shall not include land in the pasture reserves or on which buildings are located; and shall be subject to final approval by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said James F. Rowell a fee patent for the lands allotted to him under the provisions of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma explain this bill?

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, J. F. Rowell is a citizen of the Kiowa Tribe. He is the only citizen of that tribe who has failed to get an allotment. This bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, under certain conditions, to allow him to have an allotment. The courts have held that he is entitled to an allotment, and there is no doubt about it. If the allotment is made, it will have to be made out of certain lands that have been reserved for school purposes. For that reason the bill is hedged about by fixing a limit on the price. The Secretary of the Interior has approved the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for an allotment of land from the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian Reservation, Okla., to James F. Rowell, an intermarried and enrolled member of the Kiowa Tribe."

CHIPPEWA INDIANS IN MICHIGAN

The bill (H. R. 694) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the Saginaw, Swan Creek, and Black River Band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a gentleman to-day spoke to me in regard to this bill. Is that the one that was before the committee some time ago when a Representative from Oklahoma was present?

Mr. HARRELD. I do not think that is the bill the Senator has reference to.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will explain the bill briefly, I can determine whether it is or not.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, this is a case where, in 1910, these Indians were authorized to bring a suit, and the attorney's fee was limited to $10,000. They never have been able to employ lawyers to go on with the case for that amount. The Secretary of the Interior has no objection to the bill and recommends it, so that the fee can be not to exceed $25,000 for carrying the case through.

Mr. KING. It involves attorneys' fees only?

Mr. CURTIS. That is all. It is an amendment to the old act.

Mr. HARRELD. That is all there is to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMANCHE INDIANS OF KIOWA RESERVATION

The bill (H. R. 2881) to compensate three Comanche Indians of the Kiowa Reservation was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD ALLOTMENTS TO KANSAS OR KAW INDIANS, OKLAHOMA

The bill (H. R. 2887) to authorize the extension of the period of restriction against alienation on the homestead allotments made to members of the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that I have had several letters recently from some association——

Mr. CURTIS. Not about this bill, I think.

Mr. KING. It was with respect to limitations imposed by the Government. One letter claimed that the Government was too strict in permitting alienations, and the other communication asserted that the Government was too liberal and that the Indians parted with their lands before they should.

Mr. CURTIS. May I explain this bill?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. These Indians were allotted land in 1902, with a 25-year restriction. The 25 years is about up. There are now about 130 full-blood Indians—98 full bloods and about 30 above three-quarters. In the last two years very valuable oil deposits have been found upon this land. The restrictions expire on all the lands—they have 160-acre homesteads and 240 acres of surplus lands—in about three years. The extension of the restrictions is only upon the homesteads after the expiration of the restrictions contained in the act of 1902. The department wants to protect the full-blood Indians, the incompetent Indians, and this bill authorizes the extension of the restrictions for 20 years upon such Indians as the Secretary deems in need of further restrictions.

Mr. KING. The Senator thinks it is all right, then?

Mr. CURTIS. There is no question about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN WINNEBAGO INDIAN RESERVATION, NEBR.

The bill (H. R. 3800) to cancel an allotment of land made to Mary Crane or Ho-tah-kah-win-kaw, a deceased Indian, embracing land within the Winnebago Indian Reservation in Nebraska, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN ROUND VALLEY INDIAN RESERVATION, CALIF.

The bill (H. R. 3900) to cancel two allotments made to Richard Bell, deceased, embracing land within the Round Valley Indian Reservation in California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW TOWN-SITE FUND

The bill (H. R. 4462) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the payment of the Choctaw and Chickasaw town-site fund, and for other purposes," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIAN CLAIMS

The bill (H. R. 5325) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 2, after line 23, to insert the following proviso: "Provided, however, That suit upon any or all claims herein authorized to be brought may, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, be conducted and prosecuted by the regular tribal attorney or attorneys employed under existing law, with such additional reasonable and necessary expenses for said attorneys to be approved and paid from the funds of the respective tribes under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as may be required for the proper conduct of such litigation"; on page 4, line 2, before the word "attorney," to strike out the word "the" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "any"; on the same line, after the word "attorneys," to strike out the word "so" and to insert the words "other than the regular tribal attorney or attorneys employed under existing law"; on line 5, after the word "incurred," to strike out the words "prior to"; on line 6, after the words "approval of," to strike out the words "this act" and to insert the words "such contract"; on line 8, after the word "for," to strike out the word "fees" and to insert the words "services and expenses"; and on line 12, after the word "States" and the comma, to insert the words "nor in any event in excess of $40,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims, notwithstanding the lapse of time or statutes of limitation, to hear, examine, and adjudicate and render judgment in any and all legal and equitable claims arising under or growing out of any treaty or agreement between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian Nations or Tribes, or either of them, or arising under or growing out of any act of Congress in relation to Indian affairs which said Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations or Tribes may have against the United States, which claims have not heretofore been determined and adjudicated on their merits by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 2. Any and all claims against the United States within the purview of this act shall be forever barred unless suit be instituted or petition filed as herein provided in the Court of Claims within five years from the date of approval of this act. The claim or claims of each of said Indian nations shall be presented separately or jointly by petition in the Court of Claims, and such action shall make the petitioner party plaintiff or plaintiffs and the United States party defendant. The petition shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed to prosecute such claim or claims under contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and said contract with such Indian tribe shall be executed in behalf of the tribe by the governor or principal chief thereof, or, if there be no governor or principal chief, by a committee chosen by the tribe under the direction and approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That suit upon any or all claims herein authorized to be brought may, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, be conducted and prosecuted by the regular tribal attorney or attorneys employed under existing law, with such additional reasonable and necessary expenses for said attorneys to be approved and paid from the funds of the respective tribes, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as may be required for the proper conduct of such litigation. Official letters, papers, documents, and records, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence, and the departments of the Government shall give access to the attorney or attorneys of the above-named Indian nations to such treaties, papers, correspondence, or records as may be needed by the attorney or attorneys of said Indian nations.

SEC. 3. In said suit the court shall also hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any claims which the United States may have against said Indian nations, but any payment which may have been made by the United States upon any claim against the United States shall not operate as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as an offset in such suit.

SEC. 4. That from the decision of the Court of Claims in any suit prosecuted under the authority of this act, an appeal may be taken by either party as in other cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 5. That upon the final determination of any suit instituted under this act the Court of Claims shall decree such amount or amounts as it may find reasonable to be paid any attorney or attorneys, other than the regular tribal attorney or attorneys employed under existing law, employed by said Indian nations for the services and expenses of said attorneys rendered or incurred subsequent to the date of approval of such contract: Provided, That in no case shall the aggregate amounts decreed by said Court of Claims for services and expenses be in excess of the amount or amounts stipulated in the contract of employment, or in excess of a sum equal to 10 per cent of the amount of recovery against the United States, nor in any event in excess of $40,000.

SEC. 6. The Court of Claims shall have full authority by proper orders and process to bring in and make parties to such suit any or all persons deemed by it necessary or proper to the final determination of the matters in controversy.

SEC. 7. A copy of the petition shall, in such case, be served upon the Attorney General of the United States, and he, or some attorney from the Department of Justice to be designated by him, is hereby directed to appear and defend the interests of the United States in such case.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he will not accept an amendment which I send to the desk?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 8, at the end of section 3, which would be after line 19, insert:

That the Mississippi Choctaws whose names do not appear upon the tribal rolls of the Choctaw Nation, but who would have been entitled to enrollment under the laws relating to the final enrollment of the citizens of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Nations if they had made application and otherwise complied with the provisions of the act of Congress pertaining thereto, may file their petition, or petitions, in said Court of Claims, which is hereby given power and authority to hear and adjudicate any claim of said Mississippi Choctaws against the United States, or against the Choctaw or Chickasaw Nations, provided that said claimants under this section shall proceed under all of the provisions and restrictions of the other sections of this act, but in the event they have no sufficient tribal organization they may proceed through a committee or as individuals.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I am sorry, but I can not accept that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. These other matters in the original bill pertain to claims against the Government of the United States. If I strike out the proposition there as to the claims against the Choctaw Nation, but merely give the right to the Choctaws in Mississippi to sue the United States, will not the Senator, with that amendment, let it go in?

Mr. HARRELD. Does the Senator mean to give them the privilege of bringing a separate suit for whatever claims they may have against the Government?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; against the Government of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, rather than to authorize that, I hope the Senator will let the bill go over and let us study the amendment. I do not think the Government of the United States is indebted to the Mississippi Choctaws in any amount, and it would not be fair——

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to jeopardize the passage of the bill, as far as that is concerned, but I would be very glad if the Senator would accept the amendment.

Mr. HARRELD. There is another objection to it. The policy of the committee——

Mr. HARRISON. I will withdraw the amendment, in the hope that the Senator will help me to get a separate bill out of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not satisfied. I would like to know the contingent obligation against the Government of the United States, and under the statement just made by the Senator from Kansas it would seem there should not be any liability against the Government. There is no moral and no legal obligation. If that is true, then why not limit the bill so that no judgment may be rendered against the Government of the United States?

Mr. HARRELD. The remarks of the Senator from Kansas referred only to the Mississippi Choctaws.

Mr. CURTIS. That is all.

Mr. HARRELD. The amendment covering them is now out by the withdrawal of it by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator state to me what contingent liability under this bill would rest upon the Government of the United States?

Mr. HARRELD. This Indian estate involving about $25,000,000, already realized and distributed, with about $12,000,000 more yet to be realized from the sale of assets, is now in its final stages. This tribe assert that they have certain claims as to which they ought to be allowed to bring suit in the Court of Claims to establish the claims against the Government itself. This is necessary in order to put these tribal affairs in a condition to be wound up and closed.

Mr. ROBINSON. A similar or identical bill has passed with reference to the other tribes?

Mr. HARRELD. Yes; with reference to the other tribes, and this is in exactly the same form.

Mr. KING. Is it not more of an action to quiet title than to recover damages?

Mr. HARRELD. No; it is more of an action to surcharge a guardian, to have a court finally pass on the report of a guardian, or something of that sort.

Mr. KING. Is there any information before the committee which indicates any possible judgment against the Government?

Mr. HARRELD. The Indians have several things they want to include in this suit. I think some of their claims are just and some are unjust; but it is necessary to authorize them to go to the court. Then it can be determined what are just and what are unjust. In other words, I think this litigation is absolutely necessary to a final winding up of the affairs of these tribes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should think they ought to be permitted to sue.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CERTIFICATES OF CITIZENSHIP TO INDIANS

The bill (H. R. 6355) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue certificates of citizenship to Indians was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, to strike out lines 3 to 9, after the enacting clause, and to insert the words, "That all noncitizen Indians born within the territorial limits of the United States be, and they are hereby, declared to be citizens of the United States"; on line 12 to strike out the words "issuance of a certificate of" and to insert the words "granting of such," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all noncitizen Indians born within the territorial limits of the United States be, and they are hereby, declared to be citizens of the United States: Provided, That the granting of such citizenship shall not in any manner impair or otherwise affect the right of any Indian to tribal or other property.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting citizenship to Indians, and for other purposes."

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I promised several Senators that at 10 minutes before 11 I would ask that we stop the calling of the calendar so that they might ask to have one or two measures taken up, and I feel like carrying out that agreement.

Mr. FLETCHER. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that we shall go on with the calendar until 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. It is suggested that I have no right to prefer it under the agreement, so I withdraw my request.

CALUMET RIVER BRIDGE, CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, earlier in the evening we passed House bill 2665, a bridge bill for the city of Chicago. The city of Chicago is straightening out the Calumet River in southwest Chicago, and extending the Roosevelt Boulevard. There is another bill, House bill 8304, granting the consent of Congress to the city of Chicago to construct a bridge across the Calumet River at or near One hundredth Street in the city of Chicago, County of Cook, State of Illinois, and I ask unanimous consent that we take up that bill for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Chicago, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Calumet River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near One hundredth Street, in the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook, in the State of Illinois, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CREEK INDIAN CLAIMS

The bill (H. R. 7913) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Creek Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE FOREIGN SERVICE

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take from the calendar Order of Business No. 566, House bill 6357, for the reorganization and improvement of the foreign service of the United States, and for other purposes. I desire to say just a word about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator?

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, let us hear an explanation of it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is this the so-called Rogers bill?

Mr. LODGE. It is the so-called Rogers bill.

Mr. KING. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator will not object.

This is a very important bill, providing for the reorganizing of the foreign service of the United States. It has passed the House twice. A similar bill came to the Senate and was reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations, but it was the last day or two of the session, and there was no opportunity to pass it through the Senate. It has now come before us again. It is a very important measure, and I should not venture to ask such prompt action on it were it not that the bill had been examined and framed with the utmost care. It has a unanimous report from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to state that the Committee on Foreign Relations gave very careful consideration to the bill, and I think action should be taken on it as speedily as possible. That is the opinion of all the members of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. That is the opinion of all the committee, without any difference.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator if consideration was given to further consolidating the service so as to put all the agents of other departments under the control of the American ambassadors?

Mr. LODGE. This is simply a consolidation of the consular and foreign diplomatic service, all under the State Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree entirely with that as a very desirable thing to do, but it seems to me it should have gone further and coordinated the other departments under the general direction of the ambassadors.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows that I sympathize with him in that view, but it was impossible to get it into this bill, but it is a step in that direction.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is a good step, and I heartily favor it. I hope we can soon take another step, and put them all under the ambassadors.

Mr. LODGE. So do I. I am entirely in favor of that. I shall not delay the Senate at this late hour, but the Senate will remember that in 1906 we put the Consular Service under a graded system. It passed out of the domain of favoritism and politics. It has improved enormously since that time. I think it is not going too far to say that we have one of the best consular services in the world, if not the best.

In 1913, under President Wilson, the same general principle was applied to the Diplomatic Service below the rank of minister and ambassador, and it has had the same admirable results there, and it has been carried out by all administrations. It is now desired to put them together. The total additional cost will be only $435,000.

I do not want to go further, because I would like to get the bill through before the time arrives to take the recess.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the bill. The only point in my mind was, if the Senator will pardon me, that I should like to see all the departments coordinated, to bring under the jurisdiction of this organization the Department of Commerce in its foreign activities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments, in section 5, on page 3, line 8, after the word "appointment," to strike out "as ambassador or minister" and to insert "to some other position in the Government service"; in section 14, on page 8, line 19, after the word "gathering," to insert a semicolon and the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That the Secretary of State is authorized to prescribe a per diem allowance not exceeding $6, in lieu of subsistence for foreign-service officers on special duty or foreign-service inspectors"; in section 18, on page 14, line 22, before the words "per centum," to strike out "50" and to insert "75"; on page 17, after line 16, to insert the following additional section:

SEC. 22. The titles "Second Assistant Secretary of State" and "Third Assistant Secretary of State" shall hereafter be known as "Assistant Secretary of State" without numerical distinction of rank; but the change of title shall in no way impair the commissions, salaries, and duties of the present incumbents.

There is hereby established in the Department of State an additional "Assistant Secretary of State," who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of $7,500 per annum.

The position of Director of the Consular Service is abolished and the salary provided for that office is hereby made available for the salary of the additional Assistant Secretary of State herein authorized.

And on page 18, line 7, to change the section number from "22" to "23," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the Diplomatic and Consular Service of the United States shall be known as the foreign service of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the official designation "foreign service officer" as employed throughout this act shall be deemed to denote permanent officers in the foreign service below the grade of minister, all of whom are subject to promotion on merit, and who may be assigned to duty in either the diplomatic or the consular branch of the foreign service at the discretion of the President.

SEC. 3. That the officers in the foreign service shall hereafter be graded and classified as follows, with the salaries of each class herein affixed thereto, but not exceeding in number for each class a proportion to the total number of officers in the service represented in the following percentage limitations: Ambassadors and ministers as now or hereafter provided; foreign service officers as follows: Class 1, 6 per cent, $9,000; class 2, 7 per cent, $8,000; class 3, 8 per cent, $7,000; class 4, 9 per cent, $6,000; class 5, 10 per cent, $5,000; class 6, 14 per cent, $4,500; class 7, $4,000; class 8, $3,500; class 9, $3,000; unclassified, $3,000 to $1,500: Provided, That as many foreign service officers above class 6 as may be required for the purpose of inspection may be detailed by the Secretary of State for that purpose.

SEC. 4. That foreign service officers may be appointed as secretaries in the Diplomatic Service or as consular officers or both: Provided, That all such appointments shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That all official acts of such officers while on duty in either the diplomatic or the consular branch of the foreign service shall be performed under their respective commissions as secretaries or as consular officers.

SEC. 5. That hereafter appointments to the position of foreign service officer shall be made after examination and a suitable period of probation in an unclassified grade or, after five years of continuous service in the Department of State, by transfer therefrom under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided, That no candidate shall be eligible for examination for foreign service officer who is not an American citizen: Provided further, That reinstatement of foreign service officers separated from the classified service by reason of appointment to some other position in the Government service may be made by Executive order of the President under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

All appointments of foreign service officers shall be by commission to a class and not by commission to any particular post, and such officers shall be assigned to posts and may be transferred from one post to another by order of the President as the interests of the service may require: Provided, That the classification of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and of consular officers is hereby abolished, without, however, in any wise impairing the validity of the present commissions of secretaries and consular officers.

SEC. 6. That section 5 of the act of February 5, 1915 (Public, 242), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of State is directed to report from time to time to the President, along with his recommendations, the names of those foreign service officers who by reason of efficient service have demonstrated special capacity for promotion to the grade of minister, and the names of those foreign service officers and employees and officers and employees in the Department of State who by reason of efficient service, an accurate record of which shall be kept in the Department of State, have demonstrated special efficiency, and also the names of persons found upon taking the prescribed examination to have fitness for appointment to the lower grades of the service."

SEC. 7. That on the date on which this act becomes effective the Secretary of State shall certify to the President, with his recommendation in each case, the record of efficiency of the several secretaries in the Diplomatic Service, consuls general, consuls, vice consuls of career, consular assistants, interpreters, and student interpreters then in office and shall, except in cases of persons found to merit reduction in rank or dismissal from the service, recommend to the President the recommissioning, without further examination, of those then in office as follows:

Secretaries of class 1 designated as counselors of embassy and consuls general of classes 1 and 2 as foreign service officers of class 1.

Secretaries of class 1 designated as counselors of legation and consuls general of class 3 as foreign service officers of class 2.

Secretaries of class 1 not designated as counselors, consuls general of class 4, and consuls general at large as foreign service officers of class 3.

Secretaries of class 2, consuls general of class 5, consuls of classes 1, 2, and 3, and Chinese, Japanese, and Turkish secretaries as foreign service officers of class 4.

Consuls of class 4 as foreign service officers of class 5.

Secretaries of class 3, consuls of class 5, and Chinese, Japanese, and Turkish assistant secretaries as foreign service officers of class 6.

Consuls of class 6 as foreign service officers of class 7.

Secretaries of class 4 and consuls of class 7 as foreign service officers of class 8.

Consuls of classes 8 and 9 as foreign service officers of class 9.

Vice consuls of career, consular assistants, interpreters, and student interpreters as foreign service officers, unclassified.

SEC. 8. That consuls general of class 1 and consuls of class 1 holding office at the time this act takes effect shall not, as a result of their recommissioning or reclassification, suffer a reduction in salary below that which they are then receiving: Provided, however, That this provision shall apply only to the incumbents of the offices mentioned at the time this act becomes effective.

That the grade of consular assistant is hereby abolished, and that all consular assistants now in the service shall be recommissioned as foreign service officers, unclassified.

SEC. 9. That sections 1697 and 1698 of the Revised Statutes are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Every secretary, consul general, consul, vice consul of career, or foreign service officer, before he receives his commission or enters upon the duties of his office, shall give to the United States a bond, in such form as the President shall prescribe, with such sureties, who shall be permanent residents of the United States, as the Secretary of State shall approve, in a penal sum not less than the annual compensation allowed to such officer, conditioned for the true and faithful accounting for, paying over, and delivering up of all fees, moneys, goods, effects, books, records, papers, and other property which shall come to his hands or to the hands of any other person to his use as such officer under any law now or hereafter enacted, and for the true and faithful performance of all other duties now or hereafter lawfully imposed upon him as such officer: Provided, That the operation of no existing bond shall in anywise be impaired by the provisions of this act: Provided further, That such bond shall cover by its stipulations all official acts of such officer, whether as foreign service officer or as secretary in the Diplomatic Service, consul general, consul, or vice consul of career. The bonds herein mentioned shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury."

SEC. 10. That the provisions of section 4 of the act of April 5, 1906, relative to the powers, duties, and prerogatives of consuls general at large are hereby made applicable to foreign service officers detailed for the purpose of inspection, who shall, under the direction of the Secretary of State, inspect the work of offices in the foreign service, both in the diplomatic and consular branches.

SEC. 11. That the provisions of sections 8 and 10 of the act of April 5, 1906, relative to official fees and the method of accounting therefor shall include both branches of the foreign service.

SEC. 12. That the President is hereby authorized to grant to diplomatic missions and to consular offices at capitals of countries where there is no diplomatic mission of the United States representation allowances out of any money which may be appropriated for such purpose from time to time by Congress, the expenditure of such representation allowance to be accounted for in detail to the Department of State quarterly under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

SEC. 13. Appropriations are authorized for the salary of a private secretary to each ambassador, who shall be appointed by the ambassador and hold office at his pleasure.

SEC. 14. That any foreign service officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State without loss of class or salary, such assignment to be for a period of not more than three years, unless the public interests demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period not to exceed one year. Any foreign service officer of whatever class detailed for special duty not at his post or in the Department of State shall be paid his actual and necessary expenses for travel and not exceeding an average of $8 per day for subsistence during such special detail: Provided, That such special duty shall not continue for more than 60 days, unless in the case of trade conferences or international gatherings, congresses, or conferences, when such subsistence expenses shall run only during the period thereof and the necessary period of transit to and from the place of gathering: Provided further, That the Secretary of State is authorized to prescribe a per diem allowance not exceeding $6 in lieu of subsistence for foreign service officers on special duty or foreign service inspectors.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of State is authorized, whenever he deems it to be in the public interest, to order to the United States on his statutory leave of absence any foreign service officer who has performed three years or more of continuous service abroad: Provided, That the expenses of transportation and subsistence of such officers and their immediate families, in traveling from their posts to their homes in the United States and return, shall be paid under the same rules and regulations applicable in the case of officers going to and returning from their posts under orders of the Secretary of State when not on leave: Provided further, That while in the United States the services of such officers shall be available for trade conference work or for such duties in the Department of State as the Secretary of State may prescribe.

SEC. 16. That the part of the act of July 1, 1916 (Public, No. 131), which authorizes the President to designate and assign any secretary of class 1 as counselor of embassy or legation, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Provided, That the President may, whenever he considers it advisable so to do, designate and assign any foreign service officer as counselor of embassy or legation."

SEC. 17. That, within the discretion of the President, any foreign service officer may be appointed to act as commissioner, chargé d'affaires, minister resident, or diplomatic agent for such period as the public interests may require without loss of grade, class, or salary: Provided, however, That no such officer shall receive more than one salary.

That section 1685 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act entitled "An act for the improvement of the foreign service, approved February 5, 1915," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1685. That for such time as any foreign service officer shall be lawfully authorized to act as chargé d'affaires ad interim or to assume charge of a consulate general or consulate during the absence of the principal officer at the post to which he shall have been assigned, he shall, if his salary is less than one-half that of such principal officer, receive in addition to his salary as foreign service officer compensation equal to the difference between such salary and one-half of the salary provided by law for the ambassador, minister, or principal consular officer, as the case may be."

SEC. 18. The President is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for the establishment of a foreign service retirement and disability system to be administered under the direction of the Secretary of State and in accordance with the following principles, to wit:

(a) The Secretary of State shall submit annually a comparative report showing all receipts and disbursements on account of refunds, allowances, and annuities, together with the total number of persons receiving annuities and the amounts paid them, and shall submit annually estimates of appropriations necessary to continue this section in full force and such appropriations are hereby authorized: Provided, That in no event shall the aggregate total appropriations exceed the aggregate total of the contributions of the foreign service officers theretofore made, and accumulated interest thereon.

(b) There is hereby created a special fund to be known as the foreign-service retirement and disability fund.

(c) Five per cent of the basic salary of all foreign service officers eligible to retirement shall be contributed to the foreign service retirement and disability fund, and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed on the date on which this act takes effect to cause such deductions to be made and the sums transferred on the books of the Treasury Department to the credit of the foreign service retirement and disability fund for the payment of annuities, refunds, and allowances: Provided, That all basic salaries in excess of $9,000 per annum shall be treated as $9,000.

(d) When any foreign-service officer has reached the age of 65 years and rendered at least 15 years of service he shall be retired: Provided, That the President may in his discretion retain any such officer on active duty for such period not exceeding five years as he may deem for the interest of the United States.

(e) Annuities shall be paid to retired foreign service officers under the following classification, based upon length of service and at the following percentages of the average annual basic salary for the 10 years next preceding the date of retirement: Class A, 30 years or more, 60 per cent; class B, from 27 to 30 years, 54 per cent; class C, from 24 to 27 years, 48 per cent; class D, from 21 to 24 years, 42 per cent; class E, from 18 to 21 years, 36 per cent; class F, from 15 to 18 years, 30 per cent.

(f) Those officers who retire before having contributed for each year of service shall have withheld from their annuities to the credit of the foreign service retirement and disability fund such proportion of 5 per cent as the number of years in which they did not contribute bears to the total length of service.

(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to invest from time to time in interest-bearing securities of the United States such portions of the foreign service retirement and disability fund as in his judgment may not be immediately required for the payment of annuities, refunds, and allowances, and the income derived from such investments shall constitute a part of said fund.

(h) None of the moneys mentioned in this section shall be assignable, either in law or equity, or be subject to execution, levy, or attachment, garnishment, or other legal process.

(i) In case an annuitant dies without having received in annuities an amount equal to the total amount of his contributions from salary with interest thereon at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually up to the time of his death, the excess of the said accumulated contributions over the said annuity payments shall be paid to his or her legal representatives; and in case a foreign service officer shall die without having reached the retirement age the total amount of his contributions, with accrued interest, shall be paid to his legal representatives.

(j) That any foreign service officer who before reaching the age of retirement becomes totally disabled for useful and efficient service by reason of disease or injury not due to vicious habits, intemperance, or willful misconduct on his part, shall, upon his own application or upon order of the President, be retired on an annuity under paragraph (e) of this section: Provided, however, That in each case such disability shall be determined by the report of a duly qualified physician or surgeon designated by the Secretary of State to conduct the examination: Provided further, That unless the disability be permanent, a like examination shall be made annually in order to determine the degree of disability, and the payment of annuity shall cease from the date of the medical examination showing recovery.

Fees for examinations under this provision, together with reasonable traveling and other expenses incurred in order to submit to examination, shall be paid out of the foreign service retirement and disability fund.

When the annuity is discontinued under this provision, before the annuitant has received a sum equal to the total amount of his contributions with accrued interest, the difference shall be paid to him or to his legal representatives.

(k) The President is authorized from time to time to establish, by Executive order, a list of places in tropical countries which, by reason of climatic or other extreme conditions, are to be classed as unhealthful posts, and each year of duty at such posts, while so classed, inclusive of regular leaves of absence, shall be counted as one year and a half, and so on in like proportion in reckoning the length of service for the purposes of retirement.

(l) Whenever a foreign service officer becomes separated from the service, except for disability, before reaching the age of retirement, 75 per cent of the total amount of contribution from his salary, without interest, shall be returned to him.

(m) Whenever any foreign service officer, after the date of his retirement, accepts a position of employment the emoluments of which are greater than the annuity received by him from the United States Government by virtue of his retirement under this act, the amount of the said annuity during the continuance of such employment shall be reduced by an equal amount: Provided, That all retired foreign service officers shall notify the Secretary of State once a year of any positions of employment accepted by them, stating the amount of compensation received therefrom, and whenever any such officer fails to so report it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to order the payment of the annuity to be suspended until such report is received.

(n) The Secretary of State is authorized to expend from surplus money to the credit of the foreign service retirement and disability fund an amount not exceeding $5,000 for the expenses necessary in carrying out the provisions of this section, including actuarial advice.

(o) Any diplomatic secretary or consular officer who has been or any foreign service officer who may hereafter be promoted from the classified service to the grade of ambassador or minister, or appointed to a position in the Department of State, shall be entitled to all the benefits of this section in the same manner and under the same conditions as foreign service officers.

(p) For the purposes of this act the period of service shall be computed from the date of original oath of office as secretary in the Diplomatic Service, consul general, consul, vice consul, deputy consul, consular assistant, consular agent, commercial agent, interpreter, or student interpreter, and shall include periods of service at different times in either the Diplomatic or Consular Service, or while on assignment to the Department of State, or on special duty, but all periods of separation from the service and so much of any period of leave of absence as may exceed six months shall be excluded: Provided, That service in the Department of State prior to appointment as a foreign service officer may be included in the period of service, in which case the officer shall pay into the foreign service retirement and disability fund a special contribution equal to 5 per cent of his annual salary for each year of such employment, with interest thereon to date of payment compounded annually at 4 per cent.

SEC. 19. In the event of public emergency any retired foreign service officer may be recalled temporarily to active service by the President, and while so serving he shall be entitled, in lieu of his retirement allowance, to the full pay of the class in which he is temporarily serving.

SEC. 20. That all provisions of law heretofore enacted relating to secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and to consular officers, which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby made applicable to foreign service officers when they are designated for service as diplomatic or as consular officers, and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 21. That the appropriations contained in Title I of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the Judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes," for such compensation and expenses as are affected by the provisions of this act are made available and may be applied toward the payment of the compensation and expenses herein provided for, except that no part of such appropriations shall be available for the payment of annuities to retired foreign-service officers.

SEC. 22. The titles "Second Assistant Secretary of State" and "Third Assistant Secretary of State" shall hereafter be known as "Assistant Secretary of State" without numerical distinction of rank; but the change of title shall in no way impair the commissions, salaries, and duties of the present incumbents.

There is hereby established in the Department of State an additional "Assistant Secretary of State," who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of $7,500 per annum.

The position of Director of the Consular Service is abolished, and the salary provided for that office is hereby made available for the salary of the additional Assistant Secretary of State herein authorized.

SEC. 23. That this act shall take effect on July 1, 1924.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SALARIES OF DISTRICT POLICEMEN AND FIREMEN

Mr. BALL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 5855, to fix the salaries of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force and the fire department of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, automatically at 11 o'clock we will take a recess.

Mr. BALL. We have two minutes yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which he has indicated.

Mr. KING. What is the bill?

Mr. BALL. Increasing the salaries of the policemen and firemen in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, in section 2, on page 3, at the end of line 4, to strike out "$3,050" and to insert "$3,250"; in line 6, after the word "inspector," to strike out "$2,000" and to insert "$2,160"; and on page 4, after line 2, to insert the heading "United States park police" and the following additional sections:

SEC. 4. That the United States park police shall be under the exclusive charge and control of the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, under the general direction of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army. It shall consist of an active officer of the United States Army, detailed by the War Department, 1 lieutenant with grade corresponding to that of lieutenant (Metropolitan police), 1 first sergeant, 5 sergeants with grade corresponding to that of sergeant (Metropolitan police), and 54 privates, all of whom shall have served three years to be with grade corresponding to private, class 3 (Metropolitan police); all of whom shall have served one year to be with grade corresponding to private, class 2 (Metropolitan police); and all of whom shall have served less than one year to be with grade corresponding to private, class 1 (Metropolitan police).

SEC. 5. That the annual salaries of the members of the United States park police force shall be as follows: Lieutenant, $2,700; first sergeant, $2,400; sergeants, $2,300 each; privates, class 3, $2,000 each; privates, class 2, $1,800 each; privates, class 1, $1,700 each.

SEC. 6. That the members of the United States park police force shall be furnished with uniforms, means of transportation, and such other equipment as may be necessary for the proper performance of their duties, including badges, revolvers, and ammunition; the United States Army officer detailed as superintendent of the United States park police, who shall use on official business motor transportation furnished and maintained by himself, and shall receive an extra compensation of not to exceed $480 per annum. Members detailed to motor-cycle service shall each receive an extra compensation of $120 per annum.

SEC. 7. That under and in accordance with section 12 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved September 1, 1916, as amended, members of the United States park police force shall be entitled to all the benefits of relief and retirement therein authorized upon the payment by each member into the policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, of an amount equal to 1½ per cent of the total basic salary received by him since September 1, 1916, as a member of such United States park police force, and as a watchman of the United States in any public square or reservation in the District of Columbia: Provided, That a member of the United States park police force, to be designated by the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, shall be a member of the police and firemen's retirement and relief board in all cases of relief and retirement of members of the United States park police force and of the White House police force: Provided further, That on and after July 1, 1924, appropriations to pay relief and other allowances authorized by said section 12 of the act of September 1, 1916, shall be paid 60 per cent from the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent from the revenues of the United States: And provided further, That on and after July 1, 1924, the rate of deduction from the monthly salary of members of the Metropolitan police force, United States park police, and the White House police force shall be 2½ per cent: And provided further, That such monthly deductions and other moneys now authorized by law to be credited to the policemen and firemen's relief fund shall continue to be credited.

SEC. 8. That the refund provided for in section 11 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, as amended, shall be paid to all members of the United States park police force who on the date on which the provisions of this act become effective are entitled to such refund by reason of contributions previously made by them to the civil service retirement fund.

SEC. 9. That the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, in his discretion, may appoint special policemen, without compensation, for duty in connection with the policing of the public parks and other reservations under his jurisdiction within the District of Columbia, such special policemen to have the same powers and perform the same duties as the United States park police and the Metropolitan police of said District of Columbia, and to be subject to such regulations as the Chief of Engineers may prescribe: Provided, That the jurisdiction and police power of such special policemen shall be restricted to the public parks and other reservations under the control of the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds.

And, on page 7, line 16, to change the section number from 4 to 10, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the annual basic salaries of the officers and members of the Metropolitan police force shall be as follows: Major and superintendent, $5,200; assistant superintendents, $3,500 each; inspectors, $3,250 each: Provided, That the inspector assigned to the supervision and command of the detective bureau shall, during the period of such assignment, be rated as and shall receive the pay of an assistant superintendent; captains, $3,000 each; lieutenants, $2,700 each: Provided, That the lieutenant assigned as assistant to the inspector commanding the detective bureau, shall during the period of such assignment, hold the rank and receive the pay of a captain; sergeants, $2,400 each; privates of class 3, $2,100 each; privates of class 2, $1,900 each; privates of class 1, $1,800 each. Driver-privates shall have the same rank and pay as privates of the above classes. Members of said police force who may be mounted on horses, furnished and maintained by themselves, shall each receive an extra compensation of $450 per annum; members of said force who may be called upon to use motor vehicles, furnished and maintained by themselves, shall each receive an extra compensation of $480 per annum; members of said force detailed to detective headquarters in the prevention and detection of crime shall each receive extra compensation of $600 per annum; members of said force who may be mounted on bicycles shall each receive an extra compensation of $70 per annum; members of said force detailed for special service in the various precincts in the prevention and detection of crime shall each receive an extra compensation of $240 per annum; and members detailed to the motor-cycle service shall each receive an extra compensation of $120 per annum.

SEC. 2. That the annual basic salaries of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall be as follows: Chief engineer, $5,200; deputy chief engineers, $3,500 each; battalion chief engineers, $3,250 each; fire marshal, $3,250; deputy fire marshal, $2,500; inspectors, $2,160 each; captains, $2,500 each; lieutenants, $2,350 each; sergeants, $2,200 each; superintendent of machinery, $3,250; assistant superintendent of machinery, $2,500; pilots, $2,250 each; marine engineers, $2,250 each; assistant marine engineers, $2,150 each; marine firemen, $1,800 each; privates of class 3, $2,100 each; privates of class 2, $1,900 each; privates of class 1, $1,800 each.

SEC. 3. That in lieu of Sunday there shall be granted to the Metropolitan police and to each officer and member of the fire department of the District of Columbia one day off out of each week of seven days, which shall be in addition to his annual leave and sick leave now allowed by law: Provided, however, That whenever the Commissioners of the District of Columbia declare that an emergency exists of such a character as to require the continuous service of all the members of the Metropolitan police force and the members of the fire department, the major and superintendent of police and the chief engineer of the fire department shall have authority, and it shall be their duty, to suspend and discontinue the granting of the said one day off in seven during the continuation of such emergency.

UNITED STATES PARK POLICE

SEC. 4. That the United States park police shall be under the exclusive charge and control of the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, under the general direction of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army. It shall consist of an active officer of the United States Army, detailed by the War Department, one lieutenant with grade corresponding to that of lieutenant (Metropolitan police), one first sergeant, five sergeants with grade corresponding to that of sergeant (Metropolitan police), and 54 privates, all of whom shall have served three years to be with grade corresponding to private, class 3 (Metropolitan police); all of whom shall have served one year to be with grade corresponding to private, class 2 (Metropolitan police); and all of whom shall have served less than one year to be with grade corresponding to private, class 1 (Metropolitan police).

SEC. 5. That the annual salaries of the members of the United States park police force shall be as follows: Lieutenant, $2,700; first sergeant, $2,400; sergeants, $2,300 each; privates, class 3, $2,000 each; privates, class 2, $1,800 each; privates, class 1, $1,700 each.

SEC. 6. That the members of the United States park police force shall be furnished with uniforms, means of transportation, and such other equipment as may be necessary for the proper performance of their duties, including badges, revolvers, and ammunition; the United States Army officer detailed as superintendent of the United States park police, who shall use on official business motor transportation furnished and maintained by himself, shall receive an extra compensation of not to exceed $480 per annum. Members detailed to motorcycle service shall each receive an extra compensation of $120 per annum.

SEC. 7. That under and in accordance with section 12 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved September 1, 1916, as amended, members of the United States park police force shall be entitled to all the benefits of relief and retirement therein authorized upon the payment by each member into the policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, of an amount equal to 1½ per cent of the total basic salary received by him since September 1, 1916, as a member of such United States park police force, and as a watchman of the United States in any public square or reservation in the District of Columbia: Provided, That a member of the United States park police force, to be designated by the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, shall be a member of the police and firemen's retirement and relief board in all cases of relief and retirement of members of the United States park police force and of the White House police force: Provided further, That on and after July 1, 1924, appropriation to pay relief and other allowances authorized by said section 12 of the act of September 1, 1916, shall be paid 60 per cent from the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent from the revenues of the United States: And provided further, That on and after July 1, 1924, the rate of deduction from the monthly salary of members of the Metropolitan police force, United States park police, and the White House police force shall be 2½ per cent: And provided further, That such monthly deductions and other moneys now authorized by law to be credited to the policemen and firemen's relief fund shall continue to be so credited.

SEC. 8. That the refund provided for in section 11 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, as amended, shall be paid to all members of the United States park police force, who, on the date on which the provisions of this act become effective are entitled to such refund, by reason of contributions previously made by them to the civil service retirement fund.

SEC. 9. That the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, in his discretion, may appoint special policemen, without compensation, for duty in connection with the policing of the public parks and other reservations under his jurisdiction within the District of Columbia, such special policemen to have the same powers and perform the same duties as the United States park police and the Metropolitan police of said District of Columbia, and to be subject to such regulations as the Chief of Engineers may prescribe: Provided, That the jurisdiction and police power of such special policemen shall be restricted to the public parks and other reservations under the control of the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds.

SEC. 10. That the salaries herein provided for shall be payable on and after July 1, 1924.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to fix the salaries of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force, the United States park police force, and the fire department of the District of Columbia."

RECESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 11 o'clock p. m.). Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate will stand in recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, May 15, 1924

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, for Thy name's sake hear us. We ask that our hearts be fashioned for the purest music and our minds fixed for the noblest thoughts. May they chant a silent and thankful refrain in grateful memory of Thy love, so amazing and so divine. Do Thou bestow rich blessings of comfort and happiness upon every citizen of our country, and bless every effort and institution that promotes peace and good will among all men. Be with us in our memories and in our anticipations. When the shades of this evening gather and we tarry alone with our thoughts, may we thank God for the day. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I present my colleague, Mr. J. ZACH SPEARING, elected on April 22, 1924, from the second congressional district of Louisiana, to succeed the late H. Garland Dupré. He desires to take the oath of office.

Mr. SPEARING appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8350) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the Judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 19, 21, 22, and 23, had asked for further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had ordered that Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. LODGE, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. HARRIS be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS INTO THE UNITED STATES—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill H. R. 7995, to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington calls up the conference report upon the immigration bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can we not agree upon some time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall use as little time as possible, and I shall be glad to grant to others in opposition to the bill the same amount of time that I used in favor of the bill.

Mr. SABATH. And the gentleman would not care to agree upon any particular time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to keep the entire debate within the hour permitted by the rules.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield me 30 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall yield the gentleman at first 15 minutes, as soon as I have used 15 minutes. We will get along all right, I think.

Mr. SABATH. There are two gentlemen who have asked me for time, who are entitled to a little time. It is not that I desire to yield the time to them, but if the gentleman from Washington will yield them time, it will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman would yield his right to the 15 minutes, then I shall be glad to yield such time as I can, but there can not be more than 30 minutes yielded on that side.

Mr. SABATH. Fifteen minutes to me, and then the gentleman from Washington will take care of these other two gentlemen?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall yield the gentleman from Illinois 10 minutes and take care of each of the other gentlemen with 5 minutes.

Mr. SABATH. I fear that would not be satisfactory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then 15 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Washington give me 10 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am afraid that I have not the time to yield.

Mr. RAKER. I feel that the House ought to know, and I thought to take at least 10 minutes to present the seaman proposition, if there be any objection made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thought that I would take care of that. I shall yield the gentleman about seven minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington that the statement be read in lieu of the report?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I have five minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall yield the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the conferees.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7995) to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That this act may be cited as the 'immigration act of 1924.'

"IMMIGRATION VISAS

"SEC. 2. (a) A consular officer upon the application of any immigrant (as defined in section 3) may (under the conditions hereinafter prescribed and subject to the limitations prescribed in this act or regulations made thereunder as to the number of immigration visas which may be issued by such officer) issue to such immigrant an immigration visa which shall consist of one copy of the application provided for in section 7, visaed by such consular officer. Such visa shall specify (1) the nationality of the immigrant; (2) whether he is a quota immigrant (as defined in section 5) or a nonquota immigrant (as defined in section 4); (3) the date on which the validity of the immigration visa shall expire; and (4) such additional information necessary to the proper enforcement of the immigration laws and the naturalization laws as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(b) The immigrant shall furnish two copies of his photograph to the consular officer. One copy shall be permanently attached by the consular officer to the immigration visa and the other copy shall be disposed of as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(c) The validity of an immigration visa shall expire at the end of such period, specified in the immigration visa, not exceeding four months, as shall be by regulations prescribed. In the case of an immigrant arriving in the United States by water, or arriving by water in foreign contiguous territory on a continuous voyage to the United States, if the vessel, before the expiration of the validity of his immigration visa, departed from the last port outside the United States and outside foreign contiguous territory at which the immigrant embarked, and if the immigrant proceeds on a continuous voyage to the United States, then, regardless of the time of his arrival in the United States, the validity of his immigration visa shall not be considered to have expired.

"(d) If an immigrant is required by any law or regulations or orders made pursuant to law to secure the visa of his passport by a consular officer before being permitted to enter the United States, such immigrant shall not be required to secure any other visa of his passport than the immigration visa issued under this act, but a record of the number and date of his immigration visa shall be noted on his passport without charge therefor. This subdivision shall not apply to an immigrant who is relieved, under subdivision (b) of section 13, from obtaining an immigration visa.

"(e) The manifest or list of passengers required by the immigration laws shall contain a place for entering thereon the date, place of issuance, and number of the immigration visa of each immigrant. The immigrant shall surrender his immigration visa to the immigration officer at the port of inspection, who shall at the time of inspection indorse on the immigration visa the date, the port of entry, and the name of the vessel, if any, on which the immigrant arrived. The immigration visa shall be transmitted forthwith by the immigration officer in charge at the port of inspection to the Department of Labor under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor.

"(f) No immigration visa shall be issued to an immigrant if it appears to the consular officer, from statements in the application or in the papers submitted therewith, that the immigrant is inadmissible to the United States under the immigration laws; nor shall such immigration visa be issued if the application fails to comply with the provisions of this act; nor shall such immigration visa be issued if the consular officer knows or has reason to believe that the immigrant is inadmissible to the United States under the immigration laws.

"(g) Nothing in this act shall be construed to entitle an immigrant to whom an immigration visa has been issued to enter the United States if upon arrival in the United States he is found to be inadmissible to the United States under the immigration laws. The substance of this subdivision shall be printed conspicuously upon every immigration visa.

"(h) A fee of $9 shall be charged for the issuance of each immigration visa, which shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"DEFINITION OF 'IMMIGRANT.'

"SEC. 3. When used in this act the term 'immigrant' means any alien departing from any place outside the United States destined for the United States, except (1) a Government official, his family, attendants, servants, and employees; (2) an alien visiting the United States temporarily as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure; (3) an alien in continuous transit through the United States; (4) an alien lawfully admitted to the United States who later goes in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory; (5) a bona fide alien seaman serving as such on a vessel arriving at a port of the United States and seeking to enter temporarily the United States solely in the pursuit of his calling as a seaman; and (6) an alien entitled to enter the United States solely to carry on trade under and in pursuance of the provisions of a present existing treaty of commerce and navigation.

"NONQUOTA IMMIGRANTS

"SEC. 4. When used in this act the term 'nonquota immigrant' means—

"(a) An immigrant who is the unmarried child under 18 years of age, or the wife, of a citizen of the United States who resides therein at the time of the filing of a petition under section 9;

"(b) An immigrant previously lawfully admitted to the United States who is returning from a temporary visit abroad;

"(c) An immigrant who was born in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Mexico, the Republic of Cuba, the Republic of Haiti, the Dominican Republic, the Canal Zone, or an independent country of Central or South America, and his wife and his unmarried children under 18 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him;

"(d) An immigrant who continuously for at least two years immediately preceding the time of his application for admission to the United States has been, and who seeks to enter the United States solely for the purpose of, carrying on the vocation of minister of any religious denomination, or professor of a college, academy, seminary, or university; and his wife, and his unmarried children under 18 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him; or

"(e) An immigrant who is a bona fide student at least 15 years of age and who seeks to enter the United States solely for the purpose of study at an accredited school, college, academy, seminary, or university particularly designated by him and approved by the Secretary of Labor, which shall have agreed to report to the Secretary of Labor the termination of attendance of each immigrant student, and if any such institution of learning fails to make such reports promptly the approval shall be withdrawn.

"QUOTA IMMIGRANTS

"SEC. 5. When used in this act the term 'quota immigrant' means any immigrant who is not a nonquota immigrant. An alien who is not particularly specified in this act as a nonquota immigrant or a nonimmigrant shall not be admitted as a nonquota immigrant or a nonimmigrant by reason of relationship to any individual who is so specified or by reason of being excepted from the operation of any other law regulating or forbidding immigration.

"REFERENCES WITHIN QUOTAS

"SEC. 6. (a) In the issuance of immigration visas to quota immigrants preference shall be given—

"(1) To a quota immigrant who is the unmarried child under 21 years of age, the father, the mother, the husband, or the wife, of a citizen of the United States who is 21 years of age or over; and

"(2) To a quota immigrant who is skilled in agriculture, and his wife, and his dependent children under the age of 16 years, if accompanying or following to join him. The preference provided in this paragraph shall not apply to immigrants of any nationality the annual quota for which is less than 300.

"(b) The preference provided in subdivision (a) shall not in the case of quota immigrants of any nationality exceed 50 per cent of the annual quota for such nationality. Nothing in this section shall be construed to grant to the class of immigrants specified in paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) a priority in preference over the class specified in paragraph (2).

"(c) The preference provided in this section shall, in the case of quota immigrants of any nationality, be given in the calendar month in which the right to preference is established, if the number of immigration visas which may be issued in such month to quota immigrants of such nationality has not already been issued; otherwise in the next calendar month.

"APPLICATION FOR IMMIGRATION VISA

"SEC. 7. (a) Every immigrant applying for an immigration visa shall make application therefor in duplicate in such form as shall be by regulations prescribed.

"(b) In the application the immigrant shall state (1) the immigrant's full and true name; age, sex, and race; the date and place of birth; places of residence for the five years immediately preceding his application; whether married or single, and the names and places of residence of wife or husband and minor children, if any; calling or occupation; personal description (including height, complexion, color of hair and eyes, and marks of identification); ability to speak, read, and write; names and addresses of parents, and, if neither parent living, then the name and address of his nearest relative in the country from which he comes; port of entry into the United States; final destination, if any, beyond the port of entry; whether he has a ticket through to such final destination; whether going to join a relative or friend, and, if so, what relative or friend and his name and complete address; the purpose for which he is going to the United States; the length of time he intends to remain in the United States; whether or not he intends to abide in the United States permanently; whether ever in prison or almshouse; whether he or either of his parents has ever been in an institution or hospital for the care and treatment of the insane; (2) if he claims to be a nonquota immigrant, the facts on which he bases such claim; and (3) such additional information necessary to the proper enforcement of the immigration laws and the naturalization laws, as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(c) The immigrant shall furnish, if available, to the consular officer, with his application, two copies of his 'dossier' and prison record and military record, two certified copies of his birth certificate, and two copies of all other available public records concerning him kept by the Government to which he owes allegiance. One copy of the documents so furnished shall be permanently attached to each copy of the application and become a part thereof. An immigrant having an unexpired permit issued under the provisions of section 10 shall not be subject to this subdivision. In the case of an application made before September 1, 1924, if it appears to the satisfaction of the consular officer that the immigrant has obtained a visa of his passport before the enactment of this act, and is unable to obtain the documents referred to in this subdivision without undue expense and delay, owing to absence from the country from which such documents should be obtained, the consular officer may relieve such immigrant from the requirements of this subdivision.

"(d) In the application the immigrant shall also state (to such extent as shall be by regulations prescribed) whether or not he is a member of each class of individuals excluded from admission to the United States under the immigration laws, and such classes shall be stated on the blank in such form as shall be by regulations prescribed, and the immigrant shall answer separately as to each class.

"(e) If the immigrant is unable to state that he does not come within any of the excluded classes, but claims to be for any legal reason exempt from exclusion, he shall state fully in the application the grounds for such alleged exemption.

"(f) Each copy of the application shall be signed by the immigrant in the presence of the consular officer and verified by the oath of the immigrant administered by the consular officer. One copy of the application, when visaed by the consular officer, shall become the immigration visa, and the other copy shall be disposed of as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(g) In the case of an immigrant under 18 years of age the application may be made and verified by such individual as shall be by regulations prescribed.

"(h) A fee of $1 shall be charged for the furnishing and verification of each application, which shall include the furnishing and verification of the duplicate, and shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"NONQUOTA IMMIGRATION VISAS

"SEC. 8. A consular officer may, subject to the limitations provided in sections 2 and 9, issue an immigration visa to a nonquota immigrant as such upon satisfactory proof, under regulations prescribed under this act, that the applicant is entitled to be regarded as a nonquota immigrant.

"ISSUANCE OF IMMIGRATION VISAS TO RELATIVES

"SEC. 9. (a) In case of any immigrant claiming in his application for an immigration visa to be a nonquota immigrant by reason of relationship under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 4, or to be entitled to preference by reason of relationship to a citizen of the United States under the provisions of section 6, the consular officer shall not issue such immigration visa or grant such preference until he has been authorized to do so as hereinafter in this section provided.

"(b) Any citizen of the United States claiming that any immigrant is his relative, and that such immigrant is properly admissible to the United States as a nonquota immigrant under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 4, or is entitled to preference as a relative under section 6, may file with the Commissioner General a petition in such form as may be by regulations prescribed, stating (1) the petitioner's name and address; (2) if a citizen by birth, the date and place of his birth; (3) if a naturalized citizen, the date and place of his admission to citizenship and the number of his certificate, if any; (4) the name and address of his employer or the address of his place of business or occupation if he is not an employee; (5) the degree of the relationship of the immigrant for whom such petition is made, and the names of all the places where such immigrant has resided prior to and at the time when the petition is filed; (6) that the petitioner is able to and will support the immigrant if necessary to prevent such immigrant from becoming a public charge; and (7) such additional information necessary to the proper enforcement of the immigration laws and the naturalization laws as may be by regulations prescribed.

"(c) The petition shall be made under oath administered by any individual having power to administer oaths, if executed in the United States, but, if executed outside the United States, administered by a consular officer. The petition shall be supported by any documentary evidence required by regulations prescribed under this act. Application may be made in the same petition for admission of more than one individual.

"(d) The petition shall be accompanied by the statements of two or more responsible citizens of the United States, to whom the petitioner has been personally known for at least one year, that to the best of their knowledge and belief the statements made in the petition are true and that the petitioner is a responsible individual able to support the immigrant or immigrants for whose admission application is made. These statements shall be attested in the same way as the petition.

"(e) If the Commissioner General finds the facts stated in the petition to be true, and that the immigrant in respect of whom the petition is made is entitled to be admitted to the United States as a nonquota immigrant under subdivision (a) of section 4 or is entitled to preference as a relative under section 6, he shall, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, inform the Secretary of State of his decision, and the Secretary of State shall then authorize the consular officer with whom the application for the immigration visa has been filed to issue the immigration visa or grant the preference.

"(f) Nothing in this section shall be construed to entitle an immigrant, in respect of whom a petition under this section is granted, to enter the United States as a nonquota immigrant, if, upon arrival in the United States, he is found not to be a nonquota immigrant.

"PERMIT TO REENTER UNITED STATES AFTER TEMPORARY ABSENCE

"SEC. 10. (a) Any alien about to depart temporarily from the United States may make application to the Commissioner General for a permit to reenter the United States, stating the length of his intended absence, and the reasons therefor. Such application shall be made under oath, and shall be in such form and contain such information as may be by regulations prescribed, and shall be accompanied by two copies of the applicant's photograph.

"(b) If the Commissioner General finds that the alien has been legally admitted to the United States, and that the application is made in good faith, he shall, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, issue the permit, specifying therein the length of time, not exceeding one year, during which it shall be valid. The permit shall be in such form as shall be by regulations prescribed and shall have permanently attached thereto the photograph of the alien to whom issued, together with such other matter as may be deemed necessary for the complete identification of the alien.

"(c) On good cause shown the validity of the permit may be extended for such period or periods, not exceeding six months each, and under such conditions as shall be by regulations prescribed.

"(d) For the issuance of the permit and for each extension thereof there shall be paid a fee of $3, which shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"(e) Upon the return of the alien to the United States the permit shall be surrendered to the immigration officer at the port of inspection.

"(f) A permit issued under this section shall have no effect under the immigration laws, except to show that the alien to whom it is issued is returning from a temporary visit abroad; but nothing in this section shall be construed as making such permit the exclusive means of establishing that the alien is so returning.

"NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS

"SEC. 11. (a) The annual quota of any nationality shall be 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such nationality resident in continental United States as determined by the United States census of 1890, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100.

"(b) The annual quota of any nationality for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1927, and for each fiscal year thereafter, shall be a number which bears the same ratio to 150,000 as the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 having that national origin (ascertained as hereinafter provided in this section) bears to the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100.

"(c) For the purpose of subdivision (b) national origin shall be ascertained by determining as nearly as may be in respect of each geographical area which under section 12 is to be treated as a separate country (except the geographical areas specified in subdivision (c) of section 4) the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 whose origin by birth or ancestry is attributable to such geographical area. Such determination shall not be made by tracing the ancestors or descendants of particular individuals, but shall be based upon statistics of immigration and emigration, together with rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses, and such other data as may be found to be reliable.

"(d) For the purpose of subdivisions (b) and (c) the term 'inhabitants in continental United States in 1920' does not include (1) immigrants from the geographical areas specified in subdivision (c) of section 4 or their descendants, (2) aliens ineligible to citizenship or their descendants, (3) the descendants of slave immigrants, or (4) the descendants of American aborigines.

"(e) The determination provided for in subdivision (c) of this section shall be made by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, jointly. In making such determination such officials may call for information and expert assistance from the Bureau of the Census. Such officials shall, jointly, report to the President the quota of each nationality, determined as provided in subdivision (b), and the President shall proclaim and make known the quotas so reported. Such proclamation shall be made on or before April 1, 1927. If the proclamation is not made on or before such date, quotas proclaimed therein shall not be in effect for any fiscal year beginning before the expiration of 90 days after the date of the proclamation. After the making of a proclamation under this subdivision the quotas proclaimed therein shall continue with the same effect as if specifically stated herein, and shall be final and conclusive for every purpose except (1) in so far as it is made to appear to the satisfaction of such officials and proclaimed by the President, that an error of fact has occurred in such determination or in such proclamation, or (2) in the case provided for in subdivision (c) of section 12. If for any reason quotas proclaimed under this subdivision are not in effect for any fiscal year, quotas for such year shall be determined under subdivision (a) of this section.

"(f) There shall be issued to quota immigrants of any nationality (1) no more immigration visas in any fiscal year than the quota for such nationality, and (2) in any calendar month of any fiscal year no more immigration visas than 10 per cent of the quota for such nationality, except that if such quota is less than 300 the number to be issued in any calendar month shall be prescribed by the Commissioner General, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, but the total number to be issued during the fiscal year shall not be in excess of the quota for such nationality.

"(g) Nothing in this act shall prevent the issuance (without increasing the total number of immigration visas which may be issued) of an immigration visa to an immigrant as a quota immigrant even though he is a nonquota immigrant.

"NATIONALITY

"SEC. 12. (a) For the purposes of this act nationality shall be determined by country of birth, treating as separate countries the colonies, dependencies, or self-governing dominions, for which separate enumeration was made in the United States census of 1890; except that (1) the nationality of a child under 21 years of age not born in the United States, accompanied by its alien parent not born in the United States, shall be determined by the country of birth of such parent if such parent is entitled to an immigration visa, and the nationality of a child under 21 years of age not born in the United States, accompanied by both alien parents not born in the United States, shall be determined by the country of birth of the father if the father is entitled to an immigration visa; and (2) if a wife is of a different nationality from her alien husband and the entire number of immigration visas which may be issued to quota immigrants of her nationality for the calendar month has already been issued, her nationality may be determined by the country of birth of her husband if she is accompanying him and he is entitled to an immigration visa, unless the total number of immigration visas which may be issued to quota immigrants of the nationality of the husband for the calendar month has already been issued. An immigrant born in the United States who has lost his United States citizenship shall be considered as having been born in the country of which he is a citizen or subject, or if he is not a citizen or subject of any country, then in the country from which he comes.

"(b) The Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, jointly, shall, as soon as feasible after the enactment of this act, prepare a statement showing the number of individuals of the various nationalities resident in continental United States as determined by the United States census of 1890, which statement shall be the population basis for the purposes of subdivision (a) of section 11. In the case of a country recognized by the United States, but for which a separate enumeration was not made in the census of 1890, the number of individuals born in such country and resident in continental United States in 1890, as estimated by such officials jointly, shall be considered for the purposes of subdivision (a) of section 11 as having been determined by the United States census of 1890. In the case of a colony or dependency existing before 1890, but for which a separate enumeration was not made in the census of 1890, and which was not included in the enumeration for the country to which such colony or dependency belonged, or in the case of territory administered under a protectorate, the number of individuals born in such colony, dependency, or territory, and resident in continental United States in 1890, as estimated by such officials jointly, shall be considered for the purposes of subdivision (a) of section 11 as having been determined by the United States census of 1890 to have been born in the country to which such colony or dependency belonged or which administers such protectorate.

"(c) In case of changes in political boundaries in foreign countries occurring subsequent to 1890 and resulting in the creation of new countries, the governments of which are recognized by the United States, or in the establishment of self-governing dominions, or in the transfer of territory from one country to another, such transfer being recognized by the United States, or in the surrender by one country of territory the transfer of which to another country has not been recognized by the United States, or in the administration of territories under mandates, (1) such officials, jointly, shall estimate the number of individuals resident in continental United States in 1890 who were born within the area included in such new countries or self-governing dominions or in such territory so transferred or surrendered or administered under a mandate, and revise (for the purposes of subdivision (a) of section 11) the population basis as to each country involved in such change of political boundary, and (2) if such changes in political boundaries occur after the determination provided for in subdivision (c) of section 11 has been proclaimed, such officials, jointly, shall revise such determinations, but only so far as necessary to allot the quotas among the countries involved in such change of political boundary. For the purpose of such revision and for the purpose of determining the nationality of an immigrant, (A) aliens born in the area included in any such new country or self-governing dominion shall be considered as having been born in such country or dominion, and aliens born in any territory so transferred shall be considered as having been born in the country to which such territory was transferred, and (B) territory so surrendered or administered under a mandate shall be treated as a separate country. Such treatment of territory administered under a mandate shall not constitute consent by the United States to the proposed mandate where the United States has not consented in a treaty to the administration of the territory by a mandatory power.

"(d) The statements, estimates, and revisions provided in this section shall be made annually, but for any fiscal year for which quotas are in effect as proclaimed under subdivision (e) of section 11 shall be made only (1) for the purpose of determining the nationality of immigrants seeking admission to the United States during such year, or (2) for the purposes of clause (2) of subdivision (c) of this section.

"(e) Such officials shall, jointly, report annually to the President the quota of each nationality under subdivision (a) of section 11, together with the statements, estimates, and revisions provided for in this section. The President shall proclaim and make known the quotas so reported, and thereafter such quotas shall continue, with the same effect as if specifically stated herein, for all fiscal years except those years for which quotas are in effect as proclaimed under subdivision (e) of section 11, and shall be final and conclusive for every purpose.

"EXCLUSION FROM UNITED STATES

"SEC. 13. (a) No immigrant shall be admitted to the United States unless he (1) has an unexpired immigration visa or was born subsequent to the issuance of the immigration visa of the accompanying parent, (2) is of the nationality specified in the visa in the immigration visa, (3) is a nonquota immigrant if specified in the visa in the immigration visa as such, and (4) is otherwise admissible under the immigration laws.

"(b) In such classes of cases and under such conditions as may be by regulations prescribed immigrants who have been legally admitted to the United States and who depart therefrom temporarily may be admitted to the United States without being required to obtain an immigration visa.

"(c) No alien ineligible to citizenship shall be admitted to the United States unless such alien (1) is admissible as a nonquota immigrant under the provisions of subdivision (b), (d), or (e) if section 4, or (2) is the wife, or the unmarried child under 18 years of age, of an immigrant admissible under such subdivision (d), and is accompanying or following to join him, or (3) is not an immigrant as defined in section 3.

"(d) The Secretary of Labor may admit to the United States any otherwise admissible immigrant not admissible under clause (2) or (3) of subdivision (a) of this section, if satisfied that such inadmissibility was not known to, and could not have been ascertained by the exercise of reasonable diligence by, such immigrant prior to the departure of the vessel from the last port outside the United States and outside foreign contiguous territory, or, in the case of an immigrant coming from foreign contiguous territory, prior to the application of the immigrant for admission.

"(e) No quota immigrant shall be admitted under subdivision (d) if the entire number of immigration visas which may be issued to quota immigrants of the same nationality for the fiscal year has already been issued. If such entire number of immigration visas has not been issued, then the Secretary of State, upon the admission of a quota immigrant under subdivision (d), shall reduce by one the number of immigration visas which may be issued to quota immigrants of the same nationality during the fiscal year in which such immigrant is admitted; but if the Secretary of State finds that it will not be practicable to make such reduction before the end of such fiscal year, then such immigrant shall not be admitted.

"(f) Nothing in this section shall authorize the remission or refunding of a fine, liability to which has accrued under section 16.

"DEPORTATION

"SEC. 14. Any alien who at any time after entering the United States is found to have been at the time of entry not entitled under this act to enter the United States, or to have remained therein for a longer time than permitted under this act or regulations made thereunder, shall be taken into custody and deported in the same manner as provided for in sections 19 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917: Provided, That the Secretary of Labor may, under such conditions and restrictions as to support and care as he may deem necessary, permit permanently to remain in the United States, any alien child who, when under 16 years of age was heretofore temporarily admitted to the United States and who is now within the United States and either of whose parents is a citizen of the United States.

"MAINTENANCE OF EXEMPT STATUS

"SEC. 15. The admission to the United States of an alien excepted from the class of immigrants by clause (2), (3), (4), (5), or (6) of section 3, or declared to be a nonquota immigrant by subdivision (e) of section 4, shall be for such time as may be by regulations prescribed, and under such conditions as may be by regulations prescribed (including, when deemed necessary for the classes mentioned in clauses (2), (3), (4), or (6) of section 3, the giving of bond with sufficient surety, in such sum and containing such conditions as may be by regulations prescribed) to insure that, at the expiration of such time or upon failure to maintain the status under which admitted, he will depart from the United States.

"PENALTY FOR ILLEGAL TRANSPORTATION

"SEC. 16. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company, or the owner, master, agent, charterer, or consignee of any vessel, to bring to the United States by water from any place outside thereof (other than foreign contiguous territory) (1) any immigrant who does not have an unexpired immigration visa, or (2) any quota immigrant having an immigration visa the visa in which specifies him as a nonquota immigrant.

"(b) If it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any immigrant has been so brought, such person, or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, charterer, or consignee of any such vessel, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each immigrant so brought, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such immigrant for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the immigrant on whose account assessed. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such sums, or while such sums remain unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of an amount sufficient to cover such sums, or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs.

"(c) Such sums shall not be remitted or refunded, unless it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that such person, and the owner, master, agent, charterer, and consignee of the vessel, prior to the departure of the vessel from the last port outside the United States, did not know, and could not have ascertained by the exercise of reasonable diligence, (1) that the individual transported was an immigrant, if the fine was imposed for bringing an immigrant without an unexpired immigration visa, or (2) that the individual transported was a quota immigrant, if the fine was imposed for bringing a quota immigrant the visa in whose immigration visa specified him as being a nonquota immigrant.

"ENTRY FROM FOREIGN CONTIGUOUS TERRITORY

"SEC. 17. The Commissioner General, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall have power to enter into contracts with transportation lines for the entry and inspection of aliens coming to the United States from or through foreign contiguous territory. In prescribing rules and regulations and making contracts for the entry and inspection of aliens applying for admission from or through foreign contiguous territory due care shall be exercised to avoid any discriminatory action in favor of transportation companies transporting to such territory aliens destined to the United States, and all such transportation companies shall be required, as a condition precedent to the inspection or examination under such rules and contracts at the ports of such contiguous territory of aliens brought thereto by them, to submit to and comply with all the requirements of this act which would apply were they bringing such aliens directly to ports of the United States. After this section takes effect no alien applying for admission from or through foreign contiguous territory (except an alien previously lawfully admitted to the United States who is returning from a temporary visit to such territory) shall be permitted to enter the United States unless upon proving that he was brought to such territory by a transportation company which has submitted to and complied with all the requirements of this act, or that he entered, or has resided in, such territory more than two years prior to the time of his application for admission to the United States.

"UNUSED IMMIGRATION VISAS

"SEC. 18. If a quota immigrant of any nationality having an immigration visa is excluded from admission to the United States under the immigration laws and deported, or does not apply for admission to the United States before the expiration of the validity of the immigration visa, or if an alien of any nationality having an immigration visa issued to him as a quota immigrant is found not to be a quota immigrant, no additional immigration visa shall be issued in lieu thereof to any other immigrant.

"ALIEN SEAMEN

"SEC. 19. No alien seaman excluded from admission into the United States under the immigration laws and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe for the ultimate departure, removal, or deportation of such alien from the United States.

"SEC. 20. (a) The owner, charterer, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof who fails to detain on board any alien seaman employed on such vessel until the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival has inspected such seaman (which inspection in all cases shall include a personal physical examination by the medical examiners), or who fails to detain such seaman on board after such inspection or to deport such seaman if required by such immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor to do so, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien seaman in respect of whom such failure occurs. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine, or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs.

"(b) Proof that an alien seaman did not appear upon the outgoing manifest of the vessel on which he arrived in the United States from any place outside thereof, or that he was reported by the master of such vessel as a deserter, shall be prima facie evidence of a failure to detain or deport after requirement by the immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor.

"(c) If the Secretary of Labor finds that deportation of the alien seaman on the vessel on which he arrived would cause undue hardship to such seaman he may cause him to be deported on another vessel at the expense of the vessel on which he arrived, and such vessel shall not be granted clearance until such expense has been paid or its payment guaranteed to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor.

"(d) Section 32 of the immigration act of 1917 is repealed, but shall remain in force as to all vessels, their owners, agents, consignees, and masters, and as to all seamen, arriving in the United States prior to the enactment of this act.

"PREPARATION OF DOCUMENTS

"SEC. 21. (a) Permits issued under section 10 shall be printed on distinctive safety paper and shall be prepared and issued under regulations prescribed under this act.

"(b) The Public Printer is authorized to print for sale to the public by the Superintendent of Public Documents, upon prepayment, additional copies of blank forms of manifests and crew lists to be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor pursuant to the provisions of sections 12, 13, 14, and 36 of the immigration act of 1917.

"OFFENSES IN CONNECTION WITH DOCUMENTS

"SEC. 22. (a) Any person who knowingly (1) forges, counterfeits, alters, or falsely makes any immigration visa or permit, or (2) utters, uses, attempts to use, possesses, obtains, accepts, or receives any immigration visa or permit, knowing it to be forged, counterfeited, altered, or falsely made, or to have been procured by means of any false claim or statement, or to have been otherwise procured by fraud or unlawfully obtained; or who, except under direction of the Secretary of Labor or other proper officer, knowingly (3) possesses any blank permit, (4) engraves, sells, brings into the United States, or has in his control or possession any plate in the likeness of a plate designed for the printing of permits, (5) makes any print, photograph, or impression in the likeness of any immigration visa or permit, or (6) has in his possession a distinctive paper which has been adopted by the Secretary of Labor for the printing of immigration visas or permits, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

"(b) Any individual who (1) when applying for an immigration visa or permit, or for admission to the United States, personates another, or falsely appears in the name of a deceased individual, or evades or attempts to evade the immigration laws by appearing under an assumed or fictitious name, or (2) sells or otherwise disposes of, or offers to sell or otherwise dispose of, or utters, an immigration visa or permit to any person not authorized by law to receive such document, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

"(c) Whoever knowingly makes under oath any false statement in any application, affidavit, or other document required by the immigration laws or regulations prescribed thereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

"BURDEN OF PROOF

"SEC. 23. Whenever any alien attempts to enter the United States the burden of proof shall be upon such alien to establish that he is not subject to exclusion under any provision of the immigration laws; and in any deportation proceeding against any alien the burden of proof shall be upon such alien to show that he entered the United States lawfully, and the time, place, and manner of such entry into the United States, but in presenting such proof he shall be entitled to the production of his immigration visa, if any, or of other documents concerning such entry, in the custody of the Department of Labor.

"RULES AND REGULATIONS

"SEC. 24. The Commissioner General, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this act; but all such rules and regulations, in so far as they relate to the administration of this act by consular officers, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of State on the recommendation of the Secretary of Labor.

"ACT TO BE IN ADDITION TO IMMIGRATION LAWS

"SEC. 25. The provisions of this act are in addition to and not in substitution for the provisions of the immigration laws, and shall be enforced as a part of such laws, and all the penal or other provisions of such laws, not inapplicable, shall apply to and be enforced in connection with the provisions of this act. An alien, although admissible under the provisions of this act, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of the immigration laws other than this act, and an alien, although admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws other than this act, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of this act.

"STEAMSHIP FINES UNDER 1917 ACT

"SEC. 26. Section 9 of the immigration act of 1917 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel to bring to the United States either from a foreign country or any insular possession of the United States any alien afflicted with idiocy, insanity, imbecility, feeble-mindedness, epilepsy, constitutional psychopathic inferiority, chronic alcoholism, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival for each and every violation of the provisions of this section, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with any mental defect other than those above specifically named, or physical defect of a nature which may affect his ability to earn a living, as contemplated in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was so afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such mental or physical defect might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $250, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien for whose account assessed. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien who is excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read, or who is excluded by the terms of section 3 of this act as a native of that portion of the continent of Asia and the islands adjacent thereto described in said section, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that these disabilities might have been detected by the exercise of reasonable precaution prior to the departure of such aliens from a foreign port, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed.

"'If a fine is imposed under this section for the bringing of an alien to the United States, and if such alien is accompanied by another alien who is excluded from admission by the last proviso of section 18 of this act, the person liable for such fine shall pay to the collector of customs, in addition to such fine but as a part thereof, a sum equal to that paid by such accompanying alien for his transportation from his initial point of departure indicated in his ticket, to the point of arrival, such sum to be delivered by the colector of customs to the accompanying alien when deported. And no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fines, or while the fines remain unpaid, nor shall such fines be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fines or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof, approved by the collector of customs: Provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to subject transportation companies to a fine for bringing to ports of the United States aliens who are by any of the provisos or exceptions to section 3 of this act exempted from the excluding provisions of said section.'

"SEC. 27. Section 10 of the immigration act of 1917 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 10. (a) That it shall be the duty of every person, including owners, masters, officers, and agents of vessels of transportation lines, or international bridges or toll roads, other than railway lines which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23, bringing an alien to, or providing a means for an alien to come to, the United States, to prevent the landing of such alien in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers. Any such person, owner, master, officer, or agent who fails to comply with the foregoing requirements shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in each case of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; or, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the person, owner, master, officer, or agent of any such vessel, such person, owner, master, officer, or agent shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000, which shall be a lien upon the vessel whose owner, master, officer, or agent violates the provisions of this section, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the appropriate United States court.

"'(b) Proof that the alien failed to present himself at the time and place designated by the immigration officers shall be prima facie evidence that such alien has landed in the United States at a time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers.'

"GENERAL DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 28. As used in this act—

"(a) The term 'United States,' when used in a geographical sense, means the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, the District of Columbia, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands; and the term 'continental United States' means the States and the District of Columbia;

"(b) The term 'alien' includes any individual not a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States, but this definition shall not be held to include Indians of the United States not taxed, nor citizens of the islands under the jurisdiction of the United States;

"(c) The term 'ineligible to citizenship,' when used in reference to any individual, includes an individual who is debarred from becoming a citizen of the United States under section 2169 of the Revised Statutes, or under section 14 of the act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved May 6, 1882, or under section 1996, 1997, or 1998 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, or under section 2 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, as amended, or under law amendatory of, supplementary to, or in substitution for, any of such sections;

"(d) The term 'immigration visa' means an immigration visa issued by a consular officer under the provisions of this act;

"(e) The term 'consular officer' means any consular or diplomatic officer of the United States designated, under regulations prescribed under this act, for the purpose of issuing immigration visas under this act. In case of the Canal Zone and the insular possessions of the United States the term 'consular officer' (except as used in section 24) means an officer designated by the President, or by his authority, for the purpose of issuing immigration visas under this act;

"(f) The term 'immigration act of 1917' means the act of February 5, 1917, entitled 'An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States';

"(g) The term 'immigration laws' includes such act, this act, and all laws, conventions, and treaties of the United States relating to the immigration, exclusion, or expulsion of aliens;

"(h) The term 'person' includes individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations;

"(i) The term 'commissioner general' means the Commissioner General of Immigration;

"(j) The term 'application for admission' has reference to the application for admission to the United States and not to the application for the issuance of the immigration visa;

"(k) The term 'permit' means a permit issued under section 10;

"(l) The term 'unmarried,' when used in reference to any individual as of any time, means an individual who at such time is not married, whether or not previously married;

"(m) The terms 'child,' 'father,' and 'mother' do not include a child or parent by adoption unless the adoption took place before January 1, 1924;

"(n) The term 'wife' and 'husband' do not include a wife or husband by reason of a proxy or picture marriage.

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATION

"SEC. 29. The appropriation of such sums as may be necessary for the enforcement of this act is hereby authorized.

"ACT OF MAY 19, 1921

"SEC. 30. The act entitled 'An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States,' approved May 19, 1921, as amended and extended, shall, notwithstanding its expiration on June 30, 1924, remain in force thereafter for the imposition, collection, and enforcement of all penalties that may have accrued thereunder, and any alien who prior to July 1, 1924, may have entered the United States in violation of such act or regulations made thereunder may be deported in the same manner as if such act had not expired.

"TIME OF TAKING EFFECT

"SEC 31. (a) Sections 2, 8, 13, 14, 15, and 16, and subdivision (f) of section 11 shall take effect on July 1, 1924, except that immigration visas and permits may be issued prior to that date, which shall not be valid for admission to the United States before July 1, 1924. In the case of quota immigrants of any nationality, the number of immigration visas to be issued prior to July 1, 1924, shall not be in excess of 10 per cent of the quota for such nationality, and the number of immigration visas so issued shall be deducted from the number which may be issued during the month of July, 1924. In the case of immigration visas issued before July 1, 1924, the four-month period referred to in subdivision (c) of section 2 shall begin to run on July 1, 1924, instead of at the time of the issuance of the immigration visa.

"(b) The remainder of this act shall take effect upon its enactment.

"(c) If any alien arrives in the United States before July 1, 1924, his right to admission shall be determined without regard to the provisions of this act, except section 23.

"SAVING CLAUSE IN EVENT OF UNCONSTITUTIONALITY

"SEC. 32. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the second conference on the disagreeing votes on the Senate amendment to H. R. 7995, a bill to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, submit the following written statement, explaining matters agreed upon by the conference committee and recommended in the text of the conference report. Section 13 has been amended in accordance with the instructions of the House.

The managers on the part of the Senate accepted the nonquota feature of the House bill but reduced these by striking out the skilled labor nonquota classification, by changing the contiguous territory clause so that it applies only to those born in such territory, and by limiting the "relative" clause to wives and children of American citizens.

Fathers and mothers are given a preferential right within quotas, together with bona fide farmers, their wives and small children, up to 50 per cent of all quotas which are more than 300.

The minimum age for students is made 15 years, and safeguards are provided for the maintenance of the status as students at accredited and designated schools.

The definition of an "immigrant" is reduced from the Senate proposal to the original House provision.

The House conferees accepted words by which "immigration certificates" are designated as "immigration visas."

The plan in the Senate amendment for determination of quotas by national origins, was accepted by the House managers after it had been rewritten and perfected.

The quota plan of the House—2 per cent based on the 1890 census (with a minimum quota of 100)—stands for three years, after which the following quota plan goes into effect:

(b) The annual quota of any nationality for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1927, and for each fiscal year thereafter, shall be a number which bears the same ratio to 150,000 as the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 having that national origin (ascertained as hereinafter provided in this section) bears to the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100.

Provisions for working out this plan are carried in paragraphs (c), (d), and (e) of section 11, including a provision for putting this plan into operation by proclamation of the President, under certain conditons.

The effect of section 11, broadly speaking, is that for three years the quota shall be based on a percentage of the foreign born in the United States in 1890, and thereafter the quota percentage shall be based upon the whole white population of the United States, with due regard for the national origin of that population.

The charge for visaing and registering the certificate and passport of an immigrant has been reduced from $11 to $10 to make it conform to other passport fees.

The fee for a permit for an outgoing alien who expects to return is reduced from $6 to $3.

A new paragraph is added to section 21 (p. 34) as follows:

The Public Printer is authorized to print for sale to the public by the Superintendent of Public Documents, upon prepayment, additional copies of blank forms of manifests and crew lists to be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor pursuant to the provisions of sections 12, 13, 14, and 36 of the immigration act of 1917.

The alien seamen's provisions of the House bill are reduced somewhat, and the "landing card" provisions are eliminated.

Paragraph (c) of section 13, page 23 (the exclusion section), reads as follows:

(c) No alien ineligible to citizenship shall be admitted to the United States unless such alien (1) is admissible as a nonquota immigrant under the provisions of subdivision (b), (d), or (e) of section 4, or (2) is the wife, or the unmarried child under 18 years of age, of an immigrant admissible under such subdivision (d), and is accompanying or following to join him, or (3) is not an immigrant as defined in section 3.

This paragraph becomes effective July 1, 1924, under the provisions of section 31.

This is the text of the original House bill, and in accord with the instructions of the House to its conferees.

ALBERT JOHNSON,
WILLIAM N. VAILE,
BIRD J. VINCENT,
JOHN E. RAKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, after a reasonable time for debate on some of the disputed items of the immigration bill, I shall move to concur in the conference report, which represents some yielding on the part of both Senate and House, with the result that the restriction bill is more restrictive than when it went from the House.

The immigration bill, if enacted into law, will go into effect July 1. I regret that we could not agree upon a plan by which the sections affecting Japanese immigration might have been deferred a few months, inasmuch as the number of Japanese who could have come in as immigrants would have been but 10 per month. The proposal did not contemplate the making of an immigration treaty, nor did it pave the way for another agreement. I wish that I could make that clear.

Members of Congress, of course, know that the original proposition which reached the Senate and House conferees, that the so-called exclusion clause be deferred some 20 months, with a proviso that if a treaty could be negotiated the exclusion clause should not go into effect, was never at any time before either House or Senate. It was offered for recognized and necessary diplomatic reasons. It was rejected by the conferees. That ended it.

The next proposal, that the exclusion clause be deferred until March 1, 1925—eight months—during which time the President might negotiate for the end of the agreement, was rejected by the House. I believe that the mere matter of date made no difference, and the Democratic leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], agrees with me on that. But it was the fear that the House might by its act be opening the way for another long line of misunderstanding as to treaties and agreements, and to a degree forfeiting its right to participate in the handling of the immigration question, that led to the failure of that proposal.

All agree that we can not settle the Japanese problem by letting Japan write or defer the writing of our immigration laws.

Mr. Speaker, we have had immigration troubles with both China and Japan. Our troubles with China, beginning with our first treaty, extended for 50 years, and resulted in six treaties, two of which were broken by this country, and two or three of which were abrogated by China. Those troubles resulted in two presidential vetoes; resulted in the establishment of two commissions by Congress to investigate matters; resulted in numerous massacres and in the authorization by Congress of payments of two large sums to China for assaults upon their people here. In all, 10 acts of Congress in reference to Chinese exclusion were passed, prior to the final Chinese exclusion act, a section of which recognizes and revives a part of an immigration treaty of 1880. In the opinion of your committee the clauses of the bill now before you correct that situation, which relates to students.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we have had 17 years of misunderstanding with Japan under the gentlemen's agreement. In view of all this, I think one may readily predict that neither the present Senate nor any future Senate will ever ratify a treaty relating wholly to immigration. It is safe to assume that the public will never countenance another gentlemen's agreement with any nation in the world.

In this connection I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at a later date by inserting a résumé of the laws, treaties, and agreements relating solely to immigration with countries of the Far East.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the vote of the other day was not an assault upon Japan. It certainly was not a reflection on the President of the United States, Mr. Coolidge, and I am sure that Congress does not desire to criticize the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, for his efforts to handle in the most diplomatic way the ever-increasing problems of the Far East.

Japan must be consoled with the fact that we are treating that nation much better than China was treated. We broke treaty after treaty with China, particularly through the Scott law of 1888 and the Geary law of 1902. Senator Dawes of Massachusetts said of the Scott act (Fiftieth Congress):

> The law was a rank and unblushing repudiation of every treaty obligation—a violation such as the United States would not dare to commit toward any warlike nation of Europe.

But, as I said the other day, this immigration bill is drawn with due regard to all of the treaties of the United States with the nations of the world. The only thing that has been in the way has been the gentlemen's agreement. Under this bill it is ended July 1. Several thousand Japanese will enter the United States before that date. Your conferees did not accept the proposal of the Senate that the exclusion clause should be effective on enactment of the law. That would have left these incoming Japanese helpless on the high seas.

Some Japanese statesmen are alarmed as to the future of the Japanese now here and in Hawaii. They need not be. The United States has progressed a long way since it massacred the Chinese at Rock Springs and stoned them elsewhere. Many Japanese are here, and they become simply a part of the many complex problems that the United States has brought upon itself through its carelessness and laxity with regard to immigration, both from Europe and Asia.

Many nations have protested against this particular bill, and others will protest, but we propose to greatly restrict immigration from all nevertheless. We recognize Japan as one of the great powers. I presume that Japan will go on with her desire and her effort to extend her zone of influence in the Orient. I am sure that Japan will realize our necessity for this legislation.

Mr. WEFALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am sorry, but I can not. I assume the United States will go on with its well-defined policies in the Far East—pacific and helpful policies. I am sure that trade and commerce will go on as before.

Mr. Speaker, we respect all nations, but we propose to control immigration to the United States. We propose to restrict immigration; we propose to exclude, and we propose further to deport all of those aliens who defy our laws or who endanger our Government. [Applause.]

All of these things are demanded by a majority, I think, in every congressional district except a dozen or two.

President Coolidge has spoken publicly in favor of restriction and in favor of exclusion. I think that is well understood. The recent proposal of the President, as presented by me to this House a week ago, did not propose to compromise the sovereignty of this Nation.

No nation can compromise its sovereignty. His proposal did give a slight extension of time for the ending of an agreement that many believe has arisen almost to the dignity of a treaty. It is, of course, not a treaty. A slight extension may have been—would have been—a better plan. But that incident has passed. It should not jeopardize this important bill here or elsewhere. I firmly believe now that it will not. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I had the privilege of addressing the Daughters of the American Revolution assembled in annual congress in Washington. I said then that it had been the pride of our country that on great national issues the Congress of the United States always has abandoned party lines and risen to patriotic heights. I believe that Congress will always do so. I believe that this moment is one of the great occasions that demands that Congress rise far above party. In fact, party divisions have never occurred with respect to immigration legislation. I believe your votes today, gentlemen of the House, will have greater effect and do more for the welfare of the United States now, 50 years from now, and for all time, than any of us can now see or any legislation we may conceive. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.] I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 15 minutes. The gentleman from Washington has used seven minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, when the time comes, which will be within one hour, I shall move to recommit the conference report with the following instruction: To strike out the national-origin scheme that has been voted down by the House and inserted by the conferees. I shall also in my motion move that we include as the nonquota immigrants the parents of American citizens over 55 years of age, the wives and children of declarants who have resided here over two years, and also the wives and children under 18 years of age of ex-service men. I will also include in that motion a proviso to strike out the alien-seamen provision and insert in lieu thereof two new sections which have the approval of all those whose sympathies are with the seamen of America and the world.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, many of you remember what occurred in 1921, immediately after the first quota bill was passed. Within six months thereafter numerous civic, patriotic, and communal organizations in our country appealed to Congress to amend the inhumane, barbarous, and harsh provisions contained in the bill. Within one year two resolutions had to be passed to eliminate those inhumane provisions which caused tremendous hardship to the unfortunate immigrants who were otherwise qualified in every way for admission.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am satisfied that this bill will create, if enacted, more hardships than the act of 1921 or the act of 1922 which we were obliged by the force of public opinion to amend twice within one year. I agree with the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] that we should restrict. I have always stood ready and willing, same as he, to deport every alien who defied our Government or deliberately violated our laws.

There is no contest on that proposition. As I stated before, I have repeatedly voted to include in the immigration laws some of the most stringent provisions as to deportation and regulation.

I approve of many of the provisions in the present law. I helped to draft them in the 1917 act, and I approve of every provision that will properly safeguard the interests of our common country. I concede that we have the absolute right and the power to legislate and to pass any restrictive measure, it matters not how harsh or discriminatory it may be. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] also lays great stress that we should not permit any foreign nation to dictate to us, and I would be the last man who would be willing to yield to any foreign nation the control of our immigration policy, but notwithstanding his oft-repeated statements and proclamations and that of some of his colleagues, I can not refrain from saying that their statements in view of what is transpiring as to the controlling of our policy by other nations must be qualified and in the future they should say, "We resent interference on the part of any other nation except Great Britain." Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we not only permit Great Britain to dictate our immigration policy, but I regret exceedingly that she has been dictating our foreign policy, our naval policy, our merchant-marine policy, and only a few days ago she made representations as to our inland-waterways policy.

I must return to my explanation of the motion to recommit. Anyone who studies this bill must come to the incontestible conclusion that we are being dictated to by Great Britain in this legislation. For weeks on the floor of this House you have been made to believe that this is only a Japanese proposition. Why, gentlemen, half a dozen European nations have made representations and objected to some of the clearly discriminatory provisions of this bill, and I have not seen or heard where the President or anyone here paid considerable attention to those objections. But though we may not pay any attention to the objection of any foreign nation, should we not pay some heed before we deliberately insult over thirty million American citizens who are declared by this bill of being of inferior stock and origin?

Let me say right here I do not wish that we should do anything which might bring about unfriendly relations with any nation.

But why does not Congress and the President take into consideration European countries outside of Great Britain?

Now, when this bill was recently on the floor the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], as well as all the other proponents of this legislation, stated to you that in view of the liberal exemption in the nonquota provision, the 1890 per cent basis, which I designated as discriminatory, would be adjusted, and that the newer immigration will derive a certain benefit out of the nonquota provision. At that time the husbands and the wives and the fathers and the mothers and children of American citizens were exempt from the quota provision.

Now, what did the conferees of the House do? Did they stand by the House bill? No. The first chance that they had they yielded to the Senate and eliminated the provision that exempted the fathers and parents and husbands of American citizens.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WATKINS. In section 6, did they not give the preference in the nonquota to children and wives?

Mr. SABATH. I know what that will amount to. It will amount to absolutely nothing. And right here I want to say that the gentleman from Oregon himself, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], and every other gentleman who introduced an immigration bill had a clause in his bill exempting from the quota the wives and children of ex-service men and of those who declared their intention to become American citizens.

Some of you, gentlemen, are laboring under the impression, I take it, that because of the exemption in the nonquota conditions will be equalized. When you take into consideration the provision of the so-called Reed scheme, the national-origin scheme, and figure it out according to the best tables which have been furnished, you will find the following results:

	Present law	2 per cent, 1890	Origin scheme
Belgium	1,563	509	260
Czechoslovakia	14,357	1,873	1,320
Denmark	5,619	2,782	1,092
France	5,729	3,878	2,763
Norway	12,205	6,453	2,433
Poland	30,979	8,872	4,509
Rumania	7,419	631	386
Spain	912	124	141
Sweden	20,042	9,561	3,707
Yugoslavia	6,426	735	602
Germany	67,607	50,129	22,018
Great Britain	77,342	62,458	91,111
Russia	24,405	1,792	4,002
Austria	7,342	990	1,840
Italy	42,057	3,889	5,878

You will note that the quota of Great Britain will be increased to 91,000, not taking into consideration the large number that may come in through and from Canada. I maintain that it is manifestly unfair, unjust, and discriminatory. I am of the opinion that within a short space of time when this bill goes into effect, you gentlemen will agree with me in the views I am expressing here. You will eventually reach the same conclusion that I am justified in my deductions, as I was right in 1921 and in 1922, something which many of you now concede.

Now, as to the wives and children of the ex-service men and the wives and children and parents of American citizens, the American Federation of Labor has recommended that we should exempt the wives and children and parents from the quota. You gentlemen who always maintain that the American Federation of Labor recommends fair legislation and say you are willing to follow it, should in all fairness follow it now. I know I have been willing, and I am now.

Mr. Quinn, the head of the American Legion, and his aid, who appeared before the committee, recommended and advocated that we should exempt the wives and children of ex-service men and that we should permit them to come outside of the quota. Notwithstanding their recommendation, and knowing how the membership has been led astray by false statements, false statistics, and false reports, I presume you are going to ignore the recommendation of that great champion of labor, Samuel Gompers, and his organization, as well as the recommendation and appeal that has been made to you by Mr. Quinn, of the American Legion. You have the votes and you can do it, but before I conclude, gentlemen, I appeal to you, to your sense of reason and conscience. You will not endanger the bill by sending it back and asking that the conferees embody these exemptions. It will not increase the number of arrivals to any very large extent. I do not think the number of wives, children, and fathers and mothers will number, in the first year, more than 15,000 or 20,000, and gradually the number will be reduced, especially in view of the fact that you have cut down the immigration to such small numbers, 160,000. I therefore feel that 10,000 mothers and fathers of American citizens and the wives and children of ex-service men will do no harm to our institutions. I am of the opinion and firmly believe that humanity and justice demand that this bill be sent back and that the conferees be instructed to embody in the bill the provision which the bill originally contained when it left the House.

Now, there is also the additional motion as to the alien-seamen provision. Sections 19 and 20, as amended in the bill, will, to my mind, nullify section 4 of the La Follette Seamen's Act. For those reasons I believe, gentlemen, if you desire to be fair and just, though you believe in restricted immigration, that you should send this bill back with the instructions I have indicated, as otherwise the seamen's rights will be restricted and subject them to the absolute control of the masters of vessels.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WEFALD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Speaker, I can say that I do not like to take the floor at this time, because I was one of those who whole-heartedly supported the immigration bill at the time it was before the House, and I fully realize the position that the chairman of the committee is in to-day. But I can not let this occasion go by without entering my protest. I can not support this bill in its present form, and I am going to vote for the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] to recommit.

To my mind, the heart of the immigration bill was the 1890 census, 2 per cent of the 1890 census, which we adopted as the quota basis. I agreed with the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] in his opening statement, when he said that, in making this immigration bill, we proposed to restrict immigration from all countries. If that had been carried out, I think no man in this House to-day would raise his voice against the bill at this time; but I find that is not the case.

As the bill will stand, under the national-origin scheme, which will go into effect on July 1, 1927, I find that two-thirds of all the immigrants coming into this country will come to us from Great Britain and Ireland. Under the present law Great Britain and Ireland could send to this country 77,342 immigrants. As the bill stood when it left the House they would be able to send 62,458, but when the national-origin scheme goes into effect in 1927 they will be able to send to this country 91,111 immigrants out of a total quota of 150,000. Now, I say it is not fair. I say it was breaking faith with us when the conference committee agreed to this most insidious scheme which the Senate conferees had written into the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is little short of a farce as it now stands. Section 6, dealing with preferences within quotas, says that, among others, preferences shall be given to quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture; and then the bill goes right ahead and cuts off immigration from those countries where agricultural laborers could come from. I submit the table that has been used all through this discussion showing quotas as they are under the present law, as the bill that we passed in the House on April 12 left them, and as they will be if the conference report is adopted and the bill as it now stands will become a law:

Quotas

Nationality or country	Present law	2 per cent of 1890 with minimum of 100	National origins under the 150,000 limit proviso
Albania	288	100	100
Armenia	230	100	100
Austria	7,342	990	1,840
Belgium	1,563	509	260
Bulgaria	302	100	100
Czechoslovakia	14,357	1,873	1,320
Danzig	301	223	100
Denmark	5,619	2,782	1,092
Esthonia	1,348	102	221
Finland	3,921	145	498
Fiume	71	100	100
France	5,729	3,878	2,763
Germany	67,607	50,129	22,018
Great Britain and Ireland	77,342	62,458	91,111
Greece	3,063	100	536
Hungary	5,747	488	1,259
Iceland	75	100	100
Italy	42,057	3,989	5,878
Latvia	1,540	117	253
Lithuania	2,622	302	444
Luxemburg	97	100	100
Netherlands	3,002	1,637	2,669
Norway	12,205	6,453	2,433

Quotas—Continued

Nationality or country	Present law	2 per cent of 1890 with minimum of 100	National origins under the 150,000 limit proviso
Poland	30,979	8,872	4,509
Portugal	2,465	474	275
Rumania	7,419	631	386
Russia	34,405	1,792	4,002
Spain	912	124	141
Sweden	20,042	9,561	3,707

Other Europe	86	125	100
Palestine	57	100	100
Syria	882	100	102
Turkey	2,654	100	119
Other Asia	92	100	100
Africa	104	100	100
Egypt	18	100	100
Atlantic Islands	121	100	134
Australia	279	120	100
New Zealand	80	100	100
Total	357,801	161,990	150,903

I submit a table setting out in detail the nationalities whose quotas will be increased under the conference bill and the increase to each individual nationality:

Increase of quotas

Nationality	Johnson bill, 2 per cent 1890 census	Conference bill	Increase over Johnson bill
Austria	990	1,840	950
Finland	145	498	353
Greece	100	536	436
Hungary	488	1,259	771
Italy	3,889	5,878	1,989
Latvia	117	253	136
Lithuania	302	444	142
Netherlands	1,637	2,669	1,032
Russia	1,792	4,002	2,210
Spain	124	141	17
Syria	100	162	62
Turkey	100	119	19
Atlantic Islands	100	134	34
Esthonia	102	221	119
Total increase for these countries			8,270
Great Britain and Ireland	62,458	91,111	28,653
Total increases			36,923

I also submit a table showing nationalities whose quotas will be decreased under the conference bill:

Nationality	Johnson bill, 2 per cent 1890 census	Conference bill	Decrease under conference bill
Belgium	509	260	249
Czechoslovakia	1,873	1,320	553
Denmark	2,782	1,092	1,690
France	3,878	2,763	1,115
Germany	50,129	22,018	28,111
Norway	6,453	2,433	4,020
Poland	8,872	4,509	4,363
Portugal	474	275	199
Rumania	631	386	245
Sweden	9,561	3,707	5,854
Yugoslavia	735	602	133
Australia	120	100	20
Switzerland	2,081	781	1,300
Total decrease			47,852

Among the nationalities whose quotas will be increased, only Finland, Latvia, Lithuania, and The Netherlands would send us any agricultural workers, and the increase for these countries in the conference bill over the Johnson bill will only be 1,263.

The immigration from Great Britain and Ireland will bring only a very small percentage of agriculturally trained persons or persons who would be apt to take up agricultural pursuits.

Most of the countries whose quotas are cut down by the conference bill would send a great percentage of agricultural workers. Denmark, Germany, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland have in the past sent us a preponderating percentage of farmers; yet the quotas from these countries have been reduced 40,975.

I shall proceed to prove the truth of these statements by the census records for the year 1920.

According to this census relating to foreign-born white farmers and farm acreage and value owned and operated by them, I find the following to be the fact: That farmers born in the following countries owned and operated farms to the values as follows:

England	$384,492,414
Scotland	162,473,851
Wales	37,675,623
Ireland	308,442,116
Total for Great Britain and Ireland	893,084,004
Norway	878,081,731
Sweden	978,605,102
Denmark	547,475,803
Switzerland	225,299,776
Germany	2,520,600,623

These figures will show clearly what nationalities have sent us our farmers. Norway has sent us farmers that own within $15,002,273 in farm values of what those born in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland own, and those born in Sweden own farm values to the extent of $85,521,098 more than those who come from Great Britain and Ireland during the same period. Yet the immigration quota from Great Britain and Ireland is increased under this bill by 28,653 and that of Norway cut down 4,020 and that of Sweden 5,854.

Farmers born in Germany own and operate farm values to the amount of about three times that of all those born in Great Britain and Ireland, yet the German quota is decreased 28,111 and that of Great Britain and Ireland increased 28,653.

I bring out these facts not because I have any but the highest regard for the people of the British Isles, nor am I actuated by any racial feelings; but the conference bill has cut the Johnson bill all to pieces for the purpose of improving it, to keep out immigrants that would drift into the cities and turn the tide of immigration onto the farm. In fact, the preference for farmer immigrants is so pronounced that one-half of our whole immigration is expected to go onto the farm.

The House managers have surrendered all along the line. They have either been weak kneed or they were not sincere when the Johnson bill was debated and passed in the House.

Every imaginable scheme for a quota basis was proposed during the discussions in the House. Two per cent of 1890, 2 per cent of 1910, 2 per cent of 1920 census, as well as 2 per cent of an average of the 1890, 1900, 1910, and 1920 censuses were proposed and all voted down except what became the heart of the Johnson bill, 2 per cent of the 1890 census. All through the debate the demand resounded that we would go back to the census that gave us the best immigration, the immigration that went onto the farm, the immigration that built our empire.

After having fought off all assaults on the 2 per cent of 1890 quota basis of the Johnson bill in the House, why did the House managers surrender and accept 1 per cent of the 1920 census as a quota basis after July 1, 1927?

What protection will there be in this immigration bill for labor?

The quota from countries with mostly nonagricultural immigration has been increased by 36,923, while the quotas from countries that would send mostly agricultural immigrants has been reduced by 47,852. This will result in the conference bill under its July 1, 1927, provision throwing about 40,000 more immigrants into our cities to compete with labor than would the Johnson bill with its 2 per cent of the 1890 census quota basis.

The Steel Trust barons, the meat packers, the mine owners, and those that act for them and speak for them will hail this bill as a good law.

Perhaps also Anglo-Saxon jingoes will hail it as a piece of patriotic legislation, but labor will find out that it is the most cunningly worked-out scheme to make it swallow a bitter dose of medicine and make it think it likes it. I supported the Johnson bill in many provisions that many men thought were too drastic. I was satisfied to have every immigrant prove that he was a good, moral person and fit to take up the duties of citizenship before we let him in. I stood for the drastic provisions in regard to deportations. But I can not sit idly by and see this nefarious scheme of big business slipped over on the people.

The seamen's provisions in this bill are so rank that they are beyond comprehension, but I shall not discuss that now. Under this bill we nearly shut out those who have proven that they make the best citizens, those with the highest percentage of literacy and the lowest percentage of crime, the strongest, the most capable, the purest Nordics.

We leave provisions in this bill that will rend families asunder, yet we take high moral ground when we do so.

The crux of the whole thing is that we give the barons of industry 40,000 more cheap laborers than the Johnson bill would have given them. It was time wasted to discuss the immigration bill in the House when it was finally written in conference and ratified without debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I was in great hopes that when this conferees' report came before the House last Friday some effort would be made by my good friends from California to restore in the bill the provision pertaining to the nonquota proposition, consisting of fathers and mothers, but it seems to me much politics has been played before the conference committee, and it was a question of bargain; it was a question of giving up everything that this House stood for when this bill came before the House for deliberation. They voted out almost everything which made the bill humane, because they were promised that if they would take out the nonquota provision for the fathers and mothers and insert in the conference report the new origin scheme after July 1, 1927, the managers of the conference would support the Japanese question, and because California wanted to be satisfied as to the removal of the Japs they agreed to the conferees' demand, which now practically destroys the whole bill and the whole of the legislation.

Now, some of you might sneer and some of you might laugh, but I tell you, my friends, that some day you will be called upon to account for your action to-day, when you go to an American citizen who has been in this country for many years and tell that American citizen that, although he has not seen his mother for 15 years, she does not come within the nonquota class because the exemption which would unite families has been removed by the legislators of the American Congress, the greatest Congress of the world, who have written into the law a provision which makes it impossible for him to bring in his mother. Now, gentlemen, that poor woman might be all alone in the world; that poor woman might be friendless over in Europe, and the only child she might have is her boy, a loyal citizen of the United States, who seeks to bring her into this country. Yet by this legislation you are going to tell that citizen, "Your mother will have to stay over there until some time, somewhere, and in some way the quota might be opened to bring in your mother." Gentlemen, if you call that humane legislation, then I do not know what humane legislation is; and I think you ought to think it over again, from the standpoint of the very argument you have made on the floor of this House that the sentiment of the Government is to legislate for the American people; and I say to you that you are not legislating for the American people nor expressing the sentiment of your constituency nor the sentiment of the Government when you attempt to keep away the parents from the child, whose aim and ambition is to bring to this country of ours, where they can be protected in their last stages of life.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; my time is limited. Gentlemen, I am not arguing with you if you want to restrict immigration. The majority of the people rule and the majority of this House has expressed its sentiment that there should be restricted immigration, and was evidenced when this bill left the House and went to conference; not that I agreed with the policy or with the manner in which you are attempting to restrict immigration or the attempt to fix quotas, but when you attempt to play around with the nonquota, which would simply unite the families which have been here for many years, the families of citizens who have been loyal, who have been faithful, who have been honorable, and who are a credit to the United States, when you tell them that they can not have their fathers and mothers come into this country, I do not think, gentlemen, you are passing proper legislation, which would meet with the general favor of the American people amongst your own constituents.

I know my friend from Oregon [Mr. WATKINS] might tell me that they are getting a preference. Well, gentlemen, that preference is nothing but camouflage, because if you will study the proposed conference report you will find it simply gives you 50 per cent of the quota allotted to the country based upon the 1890 census, so that if a nation has 1,000 of a quota she can allot 500 of that number to the preference class, and the agriculturists, their wives, and their minor children can consume that 50 per cent. Now, who is going to be the judge of the preference?

Palestine under the present law gets 57. Under the 2 per cent of 1890 census she gets only a minimum of 100. Under the origin scheme she gets 100. Only 50 would be entitled to be placed in the preference class beginning with the new July 1 quota. The consul may visé 50 agriculturists under this preference, which would practically and completely deprive a citizen who may have his father and mother, or both, in Palestine to come to join him in this country. It would discriminate against him by bringing in his own people, and this argument applies not only to Palestine but to almost every other nation except Great Britain and Germany, because their quotas are so large that there may be good chances for preferences to be recognized and allowed. Is it fair to say that preferences may be given to one part of Europe more than to another? Is it fair to say that because the father and mother of a citizen live in one part of Europe they can more easily join their children; or is it fair to say that because they happen to live in another part of Europe whose quota is almost nought, that they must be discriminated against because that particular country has so small a quota that only a handful can come in? It does not require much argument to understand the situation, and surely no argument can be presented against the statements I make, because these are facts, not inferences that I make.

We were confronted with them at the beginning of the new immigration law, which is to be a permanent policy of the United States, with no powers vested in any commission to relieve the hardships that we are confronted with at this stage of the enactment of the permanent policy of the Government.

Until this time I have not yet heard any explanation by the members of the conference or the managers as to why the origin scheme was incorporated in the conference report and have not yet heard the reason why the father and mother was removed from the nonquota class. Is it a secret? Is it something that no one is entitled to know? Are not we entitled to know something about this legislation? Is this a star-chamber proceeding and should not the committee constituting the conferees of this House at least justify their action in allowing the managers to remove from the House bill the most humane provision, as a result of which it permitted this House to support the bill along the lines indicated?

The day is not far away when some of your own constituents will call upon you to bring about the admission of their fathers and mothers, when you will have to be honorable enough and tell your constituents, American citizens who are entitled to every privilege America can afford them, that you, their Representative, were the cause of removing from the bill the nonquota relative, namely, the father and mother, thereby depriving them from bringing into this country their relatives under the preference allowed which may and may not be given.

Now that you have restored your Japanese question in the conference report, you are simply deserting all the other provisions of the House bill. Is that what you call legislating for the American people? I do not think so nor do you. Is it because you gained your point to exclude the Japanese that you are satisfied and now disregard other cries from all parts of the country which demand the uniting of families of the white races?

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, that you will practice what you preach and support the motion which will be made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] to recommit the bill for further amendments so that we may restore the very thing that we hold so dear to us—our mother. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes

Mr BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have voted for this immigration bill and am in favor of the general provisions of it, but there are several inconsistencies in it which I think ought to be remedied and the bill recommitted back to the committee on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Section 3 of this bill defines an immigrant as meaning "any alien departing from any place outside the United States destined for the United States." Then it goes on and makes six exceptions that are excepted from the operation of this immigration bill. The fifth exception is the one I wish to call the attention of the House to. It provides as follows:

A bona fide alien seaman serving as such on a vessel arriving at a port of the United States and seeking to enter temporarily the United States solely in the pursuit of his calling as a seaman.

Thus a bona fide alien seaman is excepted from the operation of this law. That was the intention of the framers of this bill, and they put it clearly and unmistakably in one of the first provisions, section 3 of the bill.

Section 19 of the bill is clearly in conflict with the provision of the bill I have just quoted, and according to my interpretation of it section 19 repeals quite a portion of the seamen's act which was passed by the Sixty-third Congress in 1916 and which is regarded as very wholesome legislation.

There was considerable criticism of the seamen's act. It was tested out in the court but was sustained, and yet with all the talk in the newspapers and the propaganda against the seamen's act there has not been an amendment even proposed that has ever been discussed in the House or in the Senate. So there is a pretty strong presumption that a law that has been on our statute books for eight years and has been attacked only in the newspapers must be a pretty wholesome and good law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I want to finish my statement first.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will yield the gentleman an additional minute. I want to set the gentleman right on the charge that we are interfering in any way with the La Follette Act.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. One of the purposes of the seamen's act was to give the seamen some liberty. They were absolutely under servitude before that act.

I want now to show you what this bill as proposed here today does. Section 19 provides as follows:

No alien seaman excluded from admission into the United States, etc., shall be permitted to land in the United States, except for medical treatment or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe for ultimate departure or deportation from the United States.

Under our existing laws there is no opportunity for alien seamen to violate our immigration laws and I never have heard of any abuse or any complaint that alien seamen were getting over here in any large numbers or violating the law.

I want to call your attention to the exact wording of section 19:

No alien seaman excluded from admission in the United States under the immigration laws and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe for the ultimate departure, removal, or deportation of such alien from the United States.

An alien seaman can not get off his ship except for medical treatment, and as he can get medical treatment on his ship with the ship doctor he, as a matter of fact, can not leave his ship. If he does not like his job, if his contract is violated, if he is subject to any indignity, no matter what, he can not leave the ship. He is a prisoner. The La Follette Seamen's Act was passed to remedy just such abuses to liberate the seamen. This bill in my opinion makes a slave of the seamen.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield the gentleman one minute more to ask a question. I want to make it just as clear as I can that the provision the gentleman has just read only applies to those who can not enter the United States, such as anarchists and others who are in the excludable classes of section 3 of the act of 1917.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman whether anarchists can come in now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Then what is the purpose of this section 19? It prevents any seaman from getting off his vessel in the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; only if he is excludable.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. BOX. I ask permission also to extend my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to any of these requests? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. I stand for this conference report. It should be adopted. I want to state to the House that I have been advised and requested by the members of the Committee on Immigration—except the two distinguished gentlemen who originally voted against the bill—to state to the House that they and their friends shall vote down any motion to recommit and shall vote for the conference report that is now before the House. I am in full accord with my colleagues who signed the majority report on the immigration bill. Nothing has occurred to cause any of us to change our views therein expressed.

The only thing I will have time to discuss now is the question of alien seamen, and I will have to state that as briefly and as rapidly as I can.

I want to say to you, gentlemen of the House, from a study of the question and from an investigation with the men who have been assisting as expert draftsmen with the Department of Labor and with all concerned, having just discussed it with the Department of Labor this morning, there can be no question, and I say to you unhesitatingly, that the provisions of the present bill do not in the slightest way repeal or modify the seamen's act.

Mr. SABATH. Why are those two sections in there then?

Mr. RAKER. I decline to yield, if the gentleman please.

Section 3 of the bill as it now stands, subdivision 5, does not include a seaman as an immigrant, and therefore the seaman can come to the country under that provision identically as he can come under the act of 1917.

Section 19, to which the gentleman referred in regard to seamen, is the provision of section 18 of the original bill, and I say unquestionably to the Members of the House that the language of section 18—now section 19 of the bill—is the same as section 32 of the immigration act of 1917, with this exception: In the former act of 1917 the act describes the treaties and various laws. This act says "immigration laws," and "immigration laws" in the definitions are described and they are identically the same.

Under the act of 1917, section 32, a vessel entering a port of the United States could unload her seamen on board, diseased and otherwise, unless a written notice was given it, and the consequence was they unloaded them by wholesale before the immigration officer could inspect them. The district attorney of New York stated that, and on investigation we found that if we required the vessel to keep on board the seamen until examination was made, then those that were admissible would be permitted to enter and those that were not would not land or enter. So under the provisions of section 20 of the present bill it provides that no vessel shall be permitted to land any seamen until examination has been made by the Health Service and the Bureau of Immigration for the purpose of ultimately determining who shall land. If he does, if he lets them steal away, if any officer connives with them and they get off the steamship, he is fined $1,000. So every man will be on board when the examination is made, and if the seamen under the law is not diseased, he will be permitted to land. That is a wholesome provision.

Mr. SABATH. Has not the gentleman insisted heretofore that the seamen's act should be amended to include a provision making it possible for the vessel to unload 50 seamen?

Mr. RAKER. No. I want to say that I never asked to repeal the seamen's act; I never during the five months of the consideration of the bill asked or requested that the seamen's act be amended. The thing I did, and the record will show it, was to make the immigration workable as to seamen—protect the seaman—and at the same time protect the United States and make the steamship companies obey the law. I have produced letters from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, which have been printed, and they said if the provisions of sections 18, 19, and 20, as originally passed by the House, had added to them two other provisions the law would be practically perfect. It would work, and work well. It would keep out those who were not entitled to enter and make the steamship companies abide by the law. Then we have these two provisions: (e)

Vessels entering the United States can take out as many seamen, excluding the dead, if any, and those who are in the hospital, as it brought in. That is simple, just, and equitable, but the great steamship companies, with all their power, were able apparently to keep out of this legislation these provisions, notwithstanding their real value, and that the seamen and their friends wanted it in; (f) that the steamship company or a vessel flying the English flag had on board 30 sailors—40 English, 5 French, and 5 Singhalese, or Japanese, or Chinese—that that vessel would be fined $1,000 for each one it brought in; and that these five men ineligible to enter would be taken from the vessel, their expenses paid, and sent back to the port from which they came or to their own country at the expense of the vessel. Is there anybody that says that that is not fair to the seamen? Is there anybody that says their country would object?

Mr. SABATH. I never opposed that.

Mr. RAKER. Why, the gentleman in conference voted to strike out the first part of the seamen's bill, which I will call attention to now. Talk about a motion to recommit—when a man votes in conference to strike out the very crux, the very heart of the law which gives the seamen the right of consideration!

I will extend my remarks under the authority heretofore given me by the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

JAPANESE EXCLUSION

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, when a candidate for Congress in the fall of 1910 I prepared a statement explaining my position on the then important questions facing the voters at the election to be held in November of that year. I stated in detail my views and followed with an enumeration of important matters I was in favor of.

The statement made was:

I am therefore in favor of—

* * * * * * *

20. An exclusion law excluding from the United States and Territories all Asiatics except certified merchants, students, and travelers.

* * * * * * *

Having been elected at the November, 1910, election I came on to Washington early in 1911. In the spring of 1911, President Taft called an extra session of Congress, and at that session I introduced my first Asiatic exclusion bill on August 11, 1911, Sixty-second Congress, first session, being House bill 13500.

In the Sixty-third Congress, first session, on April 7, 1913, House bill 102 was introduced. This was a very full and comprehensive bill to exclude Asiatics, which included Japanese.

I constantly kept this legislation before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House, the Congress, and the country. Reintroducing it each Congress thereafter, the last being House bill 113, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session.

In 1917 we were able to assist in placing on the immigration bill that finally passed both Houses a provision excluding the Hindoos. We tried to have Japanese placed in the same barred zone, but in this we failed.

Have been a member of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization continually since 1913. Helped to write and pass the immigration act of February 5, 1917, and all immigration and naturalization laws since 1913.

On June 27, 1922—Sixty-seventh Congress, second session—I introduced H. R. 12193. The bill was the first ever introduced in Congress carrying the provision that "no alien ineligible to citizenship should be admitted to the United States."

The provisions of H. R. 12193 on this question read as follows:

That no alien ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States shall be admitted to the United States. (Subdivision 2 of section 2.)

Later in the Sixty-seventh Congress, fourth session, the chairman, on February 9, 1923, introduced a bill, H. R. 14273, on immigration, but it provided that—subdivision (b), section 12—

(b) An immigrant not eligible to citizenship shall not be admitted to the United States unless such immigrant (1) is admissible as a nonquota immigrant under the provisions of subdivision (c), (e), or (h) of section 4; or (2) is the wife or unmarried minor child of an immigrant admissible under such subdivision (c), and is accompanying or following to join him.

On February 15, 1923, the House Committee on Immigration reported to the House S. 4092 by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting an entirely new immigration bill as one amendment. Subdivision (b) of section 12 of this amendment to S. 4092 carried a provision that—

An immigrant not eligible to citizenship shall not be admitted to the United States * * *.

This is the first time any bill from a committee carrying this or similar provision excluding aliens ineligible to citizenship was ever reported to either House of Congress.

While we helped to secure this subdivision (b) of section 12 on this amendment it was never entirely satisfactory to us. I always wanted it in the language of subdivision 2 of section 2 of H. R. 12193, and reading—

No alien ineligible to citizenship shall be admitted to the United States.

By reason of the rush during the closing months of the Sixty-seventh Congress S. 4092, with this House amendment, died a natural death on the calendar.

On the opening of the Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, on December 5, 1923, I introduced H. R. 5. Subdivision (b) of section 12 of that bill reads as follows:

No alien ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States shall be admitted to the United States unless such alien (1) is admissible as a nonquota immigrant under the provisions of subdivisions (c) or (h) of section 4; or (2) is the wife or unmarried minor child, under 16 years of age, of an immigrant admissible under such subdivision (c) and is accompanying or following to join him; or (3) is an individual specified in subdivisions (1), (2), (3), or (4) of section 3 of this act.

Subdivision (c) of section 4, specified in section 12 above, is:

(c) An immigrant who continuously for at least two years immediately preceding the time of his application for admission to the United States has been, and who seeks to enter the United States solely for the purpose of, carrying on the vocation of minister of any religious denomination, professor of a college or seminary, or member of any recognized learned profession.

Subdivisions (1), (2), (3), and (4) of section 3, specified in section 12 above, are:

(1) A Government official, his family, attendants, servants, and employees;

(2) An alien visiting the United States as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure;

(3) An alien in continuous transit through the United States; and

(4) An alien lawfully admitted to the United States who later goes in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory.

H. R. 101, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, on December 5, 1923, was introduced by Mr. JOHNSON, of Washington, chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House.

Subdivision (b) of section 12 of this bill H. R. 101 is as follows:

(b) An immigrant not eligible to citizenship shall not be admitted to the United States unless such immigrant (1) is admissible as a nonquota immigrant under the provisions of subdivision (b), (d), or (g) of section 4, or (2) is the wife or unmarried minor child of an immigrant admissible under such subdivision (d), and is accompanying or following to join him.

Public hearings were had on H. R. 5, H. R. 101, and H. R. 561 during December, 1923, and January, 1924. Thereupon the committee took the proposed legislation up for the purpose of reporting same to the House.

H. R. 101 was taken as the basis for consideration, though H. R. 5 and H. R. 101 were in many respects practically the same, the chairman's bill always being considered in preference to other bills on the same subject. The whole subject of immigration was fully considered, and the chairman on behalf of the committee introduced H. R. 6540 on February 1, 1924, which was reported to the House on February 9, 1924. During the consideration of H. R. 101, subdivision (b) of section 12 of H. R. 5 was substituted for subdivision (b) of section 12 of H. R. 101.

Thus H. R. 6540, as introduced and as reported out by the committee, carried the provisions of subdivision (b) of section 12 of H. R. 5. After further consideration and deliberation the chairman, for and on behalf of the committee, introduced H. R. 7995 on March 17, 1924. This was done to perfect the bill and avoid consideration of many amendments while the bill would be under consideration by the House. On March 24 the committee reported H. R. 7995 to the House.

H. R. 7995, with one amendment, finally passed the House on April 12, 1924, and on April 18, 1924, passed the Senate with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause of the House bill, H. R. 7995, and inserting the Senate bill, S. 2576, as one amendment. See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 6645 to 6649, April 18, 1924.

The Senate bill, S. 2576, never carried any provision relative to the exclusion of aliens ineligible to citizenship. This bill was reported to the Senate by the Senate Committee on Immigration on March 27, 1924. No bill had been introduced in the Senate containing any provisions like those of subdivision (b) of section 12 of H. R. 5 and the bills H. R. 6540 and H. R. 7995 at any time.

In the Senate, on April 2, 1924, a proposed amendment by the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] was presented to S. 2576, which proposed amendment was in the language of subdivision (b) of section 12 of H. R. 7995—H. R. 5 and H. R. 6540. This proposed Senate amendment was then ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

But on April 15 an amendment was presented in the Senate to S. 2576, which amendment as agreed to was in the same language as that carried in the House bills. On adopting this amendment on April 15, 1924—see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6377—after the amendment had been presented by Senator REED of Pennsylvania and read by the Clerk the following occurred:

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator say that this is identical with the provision in the bill passed by the House?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is identical in its effect. It avoids a duplication of words, but in effect it is exactly the same. * * *

The amendment of Senator REED was agreed to.

The House bill, H. R. 7995, with the Senate amendment, went to conference. The conferees agreed to the provision of the House bill in the language as it passed the House—subdivision (b) of section 12 of H. R. 7995—which conference report having finally been approved by the two Houses and approved by the President is now the law.

I have set out the history of this provision of the immigration act of 1924, as it relates to Japanese exclusion, to the end that the record might be kept straight and, at the same time, easy of access.

Have not gone into the many other admirable features of the immigration act of 1924, upon which I have given every aid and assistance. The Committee on Immigration of the House, to a man, gave their best efforts, and this combined labor, to my way of thinking, has produced a humane and workable piece of legislation, which was much needed to meet the serious impending situation. It is not perfect by any means, though it represented the composite judgment of the committee and thereafter received the sanction of both Houses.

When it is put in actual practice and operation, no doubt there will develop questions overlooked or some inserted that should not have been, but on the whole it is a step, and a big one, in the right direction. Corrections, if any, when, and if necessary, can be made by Congress hereafter by way of amendment.

ALIEN SEAMEN

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is my intention to discuss the provisions of the immigration act of 1924 as it relates to alien seamen. The discussion will go to the preparation of this legislation in relation to what should have gone into the bill, what did go in as it left the committee, and finally the elimination of certain provisions and as the report came from the conferees, which conference report was adopted by the two Houses and the bill approved by the President.

I presented to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House a communication from Mr. Andrew Furuseth of date December 29, 1923, which was printed as part of the hearings (see statement of Mr. Furuseth before the committee hearings, vol. ser. 1–A, pp. 152–179; also vol. ser. 2–A, pp. 1110–1148, of the 68th Cong., 1st. sess.), which statement is as follows:

DECEMBER 29, 1923.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: On December 3, 1923, the Secretary of Labor called a conference in his office for the purpose of consultation about an immigration bill which was then being prepared in the department. Invited to this conference were Mr. Gompers, Mr. Morrison, president and secretary, respectively, of the American Federation of Labor, and other representatives of other labor organizations, including myself.

The eighteenth section of that bill dealt with seamen and gave to the Secretary of Labor the power to hold seamen coming into the ports of the United States on the vessels on which they serve, unless they could furnish such bond as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe.

The twentieth section provided for the reestablishment of a landing card, which, of course, includes a registration of cards issued. Realizing that the Secretary of Labor ultimately would be compelled to demand bonds from every seaman before he was granted shore leave, I protested, because it would repeal the freedom clauses of the seamen's act, impose upon the seamen an undue and unusual hardship, and largely fail of its stated purpose.

After some discussion it became apparent that the conference, as such, could reach no agreement upon the subject, the Secretary of Labor taking one position and practically the entire conference taking the other. The Secretary then appointed a committee of three, consisting of Mr. Gompers, Mr. Wallace, and myself. This committee was to draft a substitute to be submitted to the Secretary of Labor within the next three days.

The substitute and a short statement of reasons therefor were submitted to the Secretary of Labor on the third day, were tentatively rejected by him, but referred to the attorney drafting the bill for further consideration. The reasons for the substitute submitted to the Secretary of Labor were as follows:

REASONS FOR THE SUBSTITUTE

"On behalf of the seamen we respectfully submit the following as a substitute for or amendment to section 18 of the draft dealing with seamen submitted and discussed at the meeting held in the Secretary of Labor's office in the afternoon of December 3, 1923.

"It was generally understood that the purpose of the sections submitted was to keep out of the United States, so far as possible, any persons who might come as seamen and as seamen get on shore, notwithstanding the fact that they are excluded from the United States by law, treaty, or otherwise.

"The second purpose was to prevent seamen eligible to citizenship and coming to the United States from leaving and mingling in the population in violation of the general immigration laws.

"Third. That it was not intended to repeal that part of the seamen's act which, while it was passed in the interest of seamen, was even more so enacted for the purpose of equalizing the wage cost of American and foreign vessels and thus give to the United States an equal opportunity in the ocean carrying trade.

"The section as proposed, and for which this is a substitute, deals with the seaman who does not initiate and is not the first cause of the persistent violation of law about which there is so much just complaint. The owner of the vessel may under existing law or proposed draft legally bring excluded persons into the harbors of the United States, and the real penalties are not visited upon the first cause—the owner or the vessel—which has its origin in self-interest and a desire to evade or violate the law, but the real force of the proposed law is placed upon the seaman, who, when he shipped, in many instances knew not that the vessel was coming to the United States.

"The vessel hires the cheapest and for the purposes of the owner and officers thereof the most effective men that he or they can find. If he or they be interested in smuggling Chinese or other excluded persons from Cuba or from the West India Islands into the United States, or narcotics from any ports, he or they will naturally choose those who are most expert as smugglers and who can best be depended upon to keep silent and accept the penalty without exposing either the owner of the ship or the officers of the ship, and without the knowledge of the latter no serious amount of smuggling can ever be carried on. The seamen from the Mediterranean countries are the best trained and most expert smugglers amongst European seamen and most likely to keep silent, and they are therefore preferred.

"On the Pacific the owner or the officers will for the same purposes act in the same way, and they will, so far as they can, employ Chinese, and, second, Filipinos. There is ample proof that wherever Chinese are employed on the Pacific smuggling of Chinese and narcotics is carried on, and it makes no difference whether the vessel is a private one or belongs to the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The smuggling by the Filipinos is largely narcotics or alcoholic beverages. The penalty of $1,000 imposed upon the owner for permitting a seaman to escape is of doubtful validity. As a criminal statute, it would be strictly construed and collusion would very likely have to be proven, and such collusion would be as difficult to prove as it is now to prove, that the masters or other officers of the vessel know anything about the smuggling that is now daily taking place. When it is seriously intended that the laws shall be obeyed the lawmakers, at least in the past, sought to make evasion more expensive than obedience, thus enlisting in the executions of the law the self-interest of anyone who might be tempted to evade or violate it.

"The shipowner brings the seaman into our ports. The seaman seeks an opportunity here, as elsewhere, to go on shore; and no nation, except for the purposes of quarantine, has so far passed any law to prohibit shore leave. When it has been prevented by the master of a ship, such prevention has invariably been evaded or violated in spite of criminal statutes and treaties of arrest, detention, and return of seamen. It is, therefore, reasonable to presume that laws or rules which could not be effectively executed, even in war time, when such laws or rules were based upon national safety, will be more extensively violated when based on immigration laws. The laws must, therefore, be so drawn as to put the responsibility upon the shipowner and the ship who bring excluded persons, except on vessels of their own nationality, and to so regulate the landing of seamen not specifically excluded as will permit the seamen to come on shore unless he be brought with the purpose above indicated, in which case the vessel must be made responsible and pay for deportation.

"That the United States can adopt such laws can not be questioned, because the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the United States may forbid foreign vessels to come into its ports for any reason and therefore may make rules under which such ships may come. The same court has decided further that at least for the purposes of immigration and the crews the ship is not a part of the soil of the nation whose flag it is flying."

The substitute is as follows:

SUBSTITUTE

"Any alien person eligible to citizenship in the United States coming to any port of the United States as a bona fide seaman employed as part of the crew of any vessel shall be permitted to land in the United States temporarily either under the act entitled 'An act to provide for the treatment in hospital of diseased alien seamen,' approved December 26, 1920, or in pursuit of his calling. Such seaman shall be examined by order of the officer in charge of immigration, and if found temporarily admissible either for hospital treatment or in pursuit of his calling, he shall be furnished with a landing certificate as provided in section 20 of this act.

"Provided, First, that no vessel the crew of which were engaged without the jurisdiction of the United States, and which is bound to a foreign port or place, shall be permitted to depart from any port in the United States unless such vessel has a crew at least equal in number with the crew which such vessel had on her arrival.

"Second. That it is hereby made unlawful for any vessel to come to a port of the United States, except in distress, with a crew which under the laws of the United States is not permitted to depart on the same vessel from any port of the United States, and such crew or such members thereof shall be taken into custody by the immigration officer in charge and shall be deported as passengers on some other vessel to the place of their shipment at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and such vessel shall not be given clearance until this proviso is complied with.

"Third. That the Commissioner General of Immigration shall cause each member of the crew of any vessel arriving in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place to be examined, and shall cause a report to be made to the collector of customs and to the Bureau of Immigration; if the examining officer finds that such crew fails to comply with the requirements of section 13 of the seamen's act (Stat. L. * * *), he shall instruct the master to keep the members of such crew or such members thereof on board of such vessel awaiting further instructions, and he shall at once specifically report such findings and instructions to the Bureau of Immigration and to the collector of customs, who shall refuse clearance of such vessel pending final investigation and action by order of the Commissioner General of Immigration, as provided in the foregoing proviso.

"Fourth. It is hereby made unlawful for any vessel to bring, except in distress, any person ineligible to citizenship in the United States, into any port of the United States, as a seaman unless he be a national of the country whose flag the vessel flies. Any such person so brought shall be taken into custody by the immigration officer in charge and shall be deported as a passenger on some other vessel, either to the place of his shipment or to the country of which he is a national at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and such vessel shall not be given clearance until such provisio is complied with."

The substitute, together with the short statement above given, was later submitted to the legislative conference committee of the American Federation of Labor, where the action and report of the committee was indorsed. Nearly all of the immigration bills submitted or in process of preparation were reported to the conference as containing a provision for bonding of seamen. It was realized that the shipowners would make a special point of employing excluded persons wherever such would be convenient; that the bonding would have to be made general; that no bona fide seamen could put up the bonds required; and that the bonding provision would only be complied with by those who were using the navigation laws for the purpose of violating the immigration laws. For these reasons the conference adopted the following resolution:

"It is the sense of this conference that we insist upon the inclusion of the substitute offered by the committee in any immigration bill; also that we will do everything possible to prevent adoption of any legislation that will compel the seamen to put up bonds before being permitted to land."

In accordance with your suggestion this report, the action thereon, and some further reasons for this action are hereby submitted to you.

ARE SUCH LAWS NEEDED

The answer is that the immigration and exclusion laws are systematically and persistently violated. The maritime law gives to the seaman the right to come on shore "in pursuit of his calling" and assumes that he will ship out again. Once on shore he may change his mind about going to sea again. He may change his status and then vanish in the population. Those who desire to come to this country and who would be stopped at the gate can in this way come in. Those who want to import excluded persons can in this way bring them into the country, and the smuggling of excluded persons is as remunerative as other smuggling. It is generally understood that $1,000 is paid by the Chinese for being landed in the United States in such a way that he can at once mingle with others of his kind; and when we know that vessels manned with Chinese are constantly going away with from 10 to 40 or even 50 men less in the crew than they had on arrival we must realize that we are here dealing with a temptation to shipowners and to officers of vessels that is great enough to tempt the shipowners as well as the officers. Again, vessels coming from Europe have on one trip to this country left behind them from 50 to 150 persons, a great many of whom would have been refused admission if coming as regular immigrants. It does, therefore, appear that something ought to be done if we are serious in our immigration and exclusion policy.

ARE SUCH LAWS JUSTIFIED

As against those who have no desire to gather wealth by violating our laws, this proposal certainly can not be said to be harsh. The vessel is obligated to take away as many persons in her crew as she brings. In all nations there are either laws or regulations prescribing a minimum crew for the safety of life and property. The vessel can not leave home ports without this minimum number, but they can take as many more as the master or owner may determine. If in the judgment of the master or owner it is necessary for the safety of life and property to have a certain number in the crew coming west from Europe or east from the Orient, it certainly follows that the same number is needed to go back over the same waters; and no nation can justly complain because we insist that the laws of that particular nation and the judgment of the shipowner as to the number needed is enforced by this country.

One result is increased safety at sea, the other is that our population is not increased. But it is said that such vessels may bring such men as are for one reason or another excluded and take away those that are already admitted and must, therefore, be more desirable. This objection, though much overestimated, is met by the two provisos which forbid vessels to come into our ports, except in distress, with certain crews or certain persons in their crews unless they be citizens or subjects of the country to which the vessel belongs. The penalty is that the persons so brought shall be taken in charge by immigration officers and shall be sent out of this country at the expense of the vessel by which brought. The cost will be so considerable that the shipowners will take care not to violate our laws. There will be less temptation to smuggle. The risk of loss will be too great; but why not let the vessels come with anybody whom they may select and then see to it that the seamen are kept on board?

First, because it is a cruelty which we would be the only nation to perpetrate. No nation denies "shore leave" to seamen on visiting vessels except for the purpose of quarantine or in time of war. Quarantine is of short duration and is not often violated; but we know from the late war that it is practically impossible to enforce the denial of shore leave even in times of war. Desertions were plentiful even with the precautions then taken. Second, because it would reestablish involuntary servitude within the jurisdiction of the United States. Third, because it would reestablish the differential in the wage cost of operating American and foreign vessels. Fourth, because the penalties would be visited upon the innocent to the exclusion of the guilty and at the same time be to a considerable extent ineffective. The three reasons first mentioned may, or should be, accepted as self-evident, but the fourth needs some statement of facts to make it easily seen by readers who are not seamen or acquainted with sea life.

When a seaman joins a vessel he subscribes to a contract called shipping articles, in which it is stated that he is to go in the vessel to a named port and thence to any port or place within certain boundaries north and south and to return to some port in the country to which the vessel belongs. The seaman does not know what countries he is to visit during the time of his employment. He is not particularly interested unless the vessel is going to some place that is known to be especially sickly, and such contingency is usually taken care of in the law. If he knew that he is going to the United States, where shore leave is forbidden, he would very likely refuse unless forced by starvation. The shipowner knows where he is going to send his vessel and he can, therefore, act accordingly when hiring the crew. If he sends his vessel to the United States with a forbidden crew or forbidden persons in his crew, he does so in violation of our law, and he is the guilty party against whom the law in decency ought to be directed.

Our immigration and exclusion laws are based upon the principle that to be permitted to come to the United States is a privilege which we extend to some and forbid to others. If John Doe, the shipowner, desires to come to the United States, he knows that he must obtain a passport, to be visèd by the American consul. If he desires to send his son here to study or for travel and pleasure, he knows that the son must be provided with a guaranty that the boy will not alter his status; and yet he, the shipowner, may send any or all of his vessels—1, 2, 20, or 50—here into our ports with subjects or citizens of some other nation and specifically excluded from the United States. Surely there is no logic in such legislation, nor can there be said to be sincerity in it. He or his son may not come, except upon specific permission, but he is permitted to bring within the jurisdiction of the United States hundreds or thousands—more or less of men—of excluded men whom he chooses to employ on his vessels; however, with the condition that those vessels are to be turned into prisons for his bondsmen here within our jurisdiction, so that the unfortunates who happen to be on his vessels may not come on shore to mingle with our population. Such legislation might not be held unconstitutional, because of the Supreme Court decision in Robertson against Baldwin, but surely would be indecent, both because it is direct inhumanity and because it would punish the innocent with imprisonment and let the guilty go free to pocket the proceeds arising out of the transaction.

But then it may be held to be contrary to the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The Supreme Court has held that the jurisdiction of the United States begins 3 miles offshore and that a foreign vessel inside of the 3-mile limit comes within the American law—that she is subject to penalties—if she has rum on board, even if the rum be under seal. A foreign vessel brings rum into the jurisdiction of the United States and seals it up, so that it may be kept on board while within the jurisdiction and again used after the vessel is again at sea, and the court says that is an offense against the sovereignty of this country; another vessel brings an excluded person into the jurisdiction, keeps him under arrest, turning the vessel into a private prison, and holds him a prisoner until the vessel is again at sea. One is tempted to ask if this be not the worst offense, since it violates not only the thirteenth amendment but also the exclusive right to imprison and punish. And the imprisonment would not be for any actual violation of law but to prevent a possible violation. Much water has gone over the dam since the Robertson against Baldwin decision was handed down and Congress has abolished the laws and treaties under which the decision was made. Are we sure that the court may not now distinguish between seamen at sea under the common hazard and seamen in port? The constitutionality could surely be questioned and the decision might be all the worse for the ship. But let us suppose that the seaman should stow away a bottle of rum in his kit or on his person. What would then be the result? Arrest, imprisonment on shore, and finally deportation at the expense of the United States.

AS TO FOREIGN NATIONS

It has already been suggested that they can not justly complain, because we would play no favorites and would only be helping them by seeing that their own laws are obeyed while in our jurisdiction; but again Great Britain takes control to see that no vessel leaves her ports undermanned. She determines the minimum crew on her own vessels and then applies that law to foreign vessels. She has boarding officers who, upon complaints, visit any vessel; and if the law is about to be violated, the vessel is held until the law is complied with.

THE SACREDNESS OF VESSEL PROPERTY

One might express some wonder about what there is about a vessel that is so sacred that the owner is to be permitted to violate the laws of this country or that the laws must be so made as to make it easy for him to violate them with impunity. Are we so eager to see foreign vessels in our ports that we must give them special privileges in order that they may come here? Or is this law that makes the vessel in an American port into a prison to apply to American vessels as well as to foreign ones? If this be the case, then the purpose is easily understood. In that case it is just an effort to man the American vessels with orientals to be hired in the Orient under the act of 1884; but this would be a death sentence of the American hope of sea power. No self-respecting American would sail under such laws.

The idea to place seamen under bonds began in the newspapers as a part of the propaganda against the seamen's act. The failure to enforce the seamen's act and to make regulations which the Department of Commerce and the Department of Labor have a right to make made it easy and safe to use one law against the other to bring both into disrepute and to prepare the public mind for such legislation as would, at least ostensibly, enforce the immigration laws. It was easy, therefore, to suggest a remedy for violation of the immigration laws which at the same time would repeal the seamen's act.

When this is brought to the attention of the promoters of the bonding idea they suggest as an alternative that the whole question of seamen be left out of the proposed immigration legislation. If that was the only reasonable and decent alternative and the only way in which the immigration laws could be made effective, the seamen would not seriously complain; but the evil so justly complained of would continue and continue to grow. Why this should be done when there is another alternative which is justifiable, human, and decent seems rather difficult to understand.

Feeling sure that these suggestions and the substitute will be given serious attention by the members of the committee and of Congress, I beg to remain,

Most respectfully,

ANDREW FURUSETH.

Proper and adequate inspection of aliens arriving as seamen at ports of the United States is required under the provisions of sections 18, 19, and 20 of the bill.

Enforcement of the sections (secs. 32, 33, and 34) of the immigration act of 1917 respecting alien seamen has been one of the most difficult tasks confronting the Immigration Service. In fact, due to a weakness in section 32, there has been no proper enforcement for several years. The flaw was that the shipmaster, although required to detain inadmissible seamen, could not be punished for failure to detain unless it was shown that he had notice in writing so to do. Notice in writing anterior to the breach of responsibility to detain was physically impossible.

Requirement of a landing card for every alien seaman is made a feature of this phase of the bill. All the rights of seamen under the La Follette Act are protected. Sections 32, 33, and 34 of the immigration act of 1917 are repealed.

Section 3 of H. R. 7995 defines an immigrant and excepts an alien seaman from such definition, namely:

DEFINITION OF "IMMIGRANT"

SEC. 3. When used in this act the term "immigrant" means any alien departing from any place outside the United States, destined for the United States, except * * * (5) a bona fide alien seaman serving as such on a vessel arriving at a port of the United States and seeking to enter temporarily the United States solely in the pursuit of his calling as a seaman.

For purposes of comparison, the new paragraphs affecting alien seamen and the paragraphs of the 1917 act to be repealed are printed in parallel columns:

ALIEN SEAMEN PROVISIONS, IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1917	ALIEN SEAMEN PROVISIONS OF H. R. 6540
SEC. 32. That no alien excluded from admission into the United States by any law, convention, or treaty of the United States, regulating the immigration of aliens, and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor providing for the ultimate removal or deportation of such alien from the United States, and the negligent failure of the owner, agent, consignee, or master of such vessel to detain on board any such alien after notice in writing by the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival, and to deport such alien, if required by such immigration officer or by the Secretary of Labor, shall render such owner, agent, consignee, or master liable to a penalty not exceeding $1,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.	SEC. 18. No alien seaman excluded from admission into the United States under the immigration laws and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe for the ultimate departure, removal, or deportation of such alien from the United States. SEC. 19. (a) Upon the arrival (after the expiration of four months after the enactment of this act) of any vessel in the United States, it shall be the duty of the owner, agent, charterer, consignee, or master thereof to deliver to the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival, in respect of each alien seaman employed on such vessel, a landing card in triplicate, stating the position such alien holds in the ship's company, when and where he was shipped or engaged, and whether he is to be paid off and discharged at the port of arrival, and such other information as may be by regulations

ALIEN SEAMEN PROVISIONS, IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1917—contd.

SEC. 33. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of the preceding section to pay off or discharge any alien employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, unless duly admitted pursuant to the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens: Provided, That in case any such alien intends to reship on board any other vessel bound to any foreign port or place, he shall be allowed to land for the purpose of so reshipping, under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe to prevent aliens not admissible under any law, convention, or treaty from remaining permanently in the United States, and may be paid off, discharged, and permitted to remove his effects anything in such laws or treaties or in this act to the contrary notwithstanding, provided due notice of such proposed action be given by the master or the seaman himself to the principal immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival.

SEC. 34. That any alien seaman who shall land in a port of the United States contrary to the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be unlawfully in the United States, and shall, at any time within three years thereafter, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and brought before a board of special inquiry for examination as to his qualifications for admission to the United States, and if not admitted said alien seaman shall be deported at the expense of the appropriation for this act as provided in section 20 of this act.

prescribed, and having permanently attached thereto a photograph of such alien.

(b) If the alien seaman after examination (which examination in all cases shall include a personal physical examination by the medical examiners) is found to be temporarily admissible to the United States, he shall be permitted to land during the stay of the vessel in port, or temporarily for the purpose of reshipping on board any other vessel bound to a place outside the United States, and the immigration officer shall cause a fingerprint of the alien to be placed upon each copy of the landing card, and indorse upon each copy the date and place of arrival, the name of the vessel, and the time during which the landing card shall be valid. Thereupon one copy of the landing card shall be delivered to him by the immigration officer, one copy shall be transmitted forthwith to the Department of Labor under regulations prescribed under this act, and the third copy shall be retained in the immigration office at the port of arrival for such length of time as may be by regulations prescribed. It shall be unlawful for any alien seaman to remain in the United States after the expiration of the validity of his landing card.

(c) Any alien who has received a landing card under this section and who departs from the United States shall, prior to his departure, surrender such card to the master of the vessel, who shall, before the departure of the vessel, deliver such card to such individual as may be by regulations prescribed.

(d) An alien seaman who departs from the United States temporarily at frequent intervals in the pursuit of his calling may be admitted to the United States, under such regulations as may be prescribed, without the requirement of a landing card in respect of each entry into the United States.

Paragraph (e) describes form of landing cards.

Paragraph (f) relates to fines.

SEC. 20. (a) The owner, charterer, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof who fails to detain on board any alien seaman employed on such vessel until the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival has inspected such seaman, and delivered to him a landing card (in cases where a landing card is required), or who fails to detain such seaman on board after such inspection or to deport such seaman if required by such immigration officer or the Secretary to do so shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien seaman in respect of whom such failure occurs. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

(b) Proof that an alien seaman did not appear upon the outgoing manifest of the vessel on which he arrived in the United States from any place outside thereof, or that he was reported by the master of such vessel as a deserter shall be prima facie evidence of a failure to detain or deport after requirement by the immigration officer or the Secretary.

AMENDMENTS PROPOSED BY ANDREW FURUSETH AFTER H. R. 7995 HAD GONE TO THE FLOOR OF THE HOUSE

On page 26 of House bill, line 9, insert the word "which" between the words "card" and "shall." Strike out the period after the word "valid" and insert "for sixty days unless extended because of sickness or litigation."

On page 28 of House bill strike out after the word "required," beginning with "or," on line 3, to and including the word "so," on line 6.

The alien seaman provision as finally reported out by the House committee, on H. R. 7995, and as it passed the House, is in the following language, namely:

ALIEN SEAMEN

SEC. 19. No alien seaman excluded from admission into the United States under the immigration laws and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe for the ultimate departure, removal, or deportation of such alien from the United States.

SEC. 20. (a) Upon the arrival (after the expiration of four months after the enactment of this act) of any vessel in the United States it shall be the duty of the owner, agent, charterer, consignee, or master thereof to deliver to the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival, in respect of each alien seamen employed on such vessel, a landing card in triplicate, stating the position such alien holds in the ship's company, when and where he was shipped or engaged, and whether he is to be paid off and discharged at the port of arrival, and such other information as may be by regulations prescribed, and having permanently attached thereto a photograph of such alien.

(b) If the alien seaman after examination (which examination in all cases shall include a personal physical examination by the medical examiners) is found to be temporarily admissible to the United States, he shall be permitted to land during the stay of the vessel in port, or temporarily for the purpose of reshipping on board any other vessel bound to a place outside the United States, and the immigration officer shall cause the fingerprints of the alien to be placed upon each copy of the landing card, and indorse upon each copy the date and place of arrival, the name of the vessel, and the time during which the landing card shall be valid. Thereupon one copy of the landing card shall be delivered to him by the immigration officer, one copy shall be transmitted forthwith to the Department of Labor under regulations prescribed under this act, and the third copy shall be retained in the immigration office at the port of arrival for such length of time as may be by regulations prescribed. It shall be unlawful for any alien seaman to remain in the United States after the expiration of the validity of his landing card.

(c) Any alien who has received a landing card under this section and who departs from the United States shall, prior to his departure, surrender such card to the master of the vessel, who shall, before the departure of the vessel, deliver such card to such individual as may be by regulations prescribed.

(d) An alien seaman who departs from the United States temporarily at frequent intervals in the pursuit of his calling, or who is employed on a vessel touching at more than one port of the United States in the course of a continuous voyage, may be admitted to the United States, under such regulations as may be prescribed, without the requirement of a landing card in respect of each entry into the United States.

(e) Landing cards shall be printed on distinctive safety paper prepared and issued, under regulations prescribed under this act, at the expense of the owner, agent, consignee, charterer, or master of the vessel. The Secretary of Labor, with the cooperation of the Secretary of State, shall provide a means of obtaining blank landing cards outside the United States.

(f) The owner, agent, consignee, charterer, or master of any vessel who violates any of the provisions of this section shall pay to the collector of customs for the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien in respect of whom the violation occurs; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine, or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs.

SEC. 21. (a) The owner, charterer, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof who fails to detain on board any alien seaman employed on such vessel until the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival has inspected such seaman, and delivered to him a landing card (in cases where a landing card is required), or who fails to detain such seaman on board after such inspection or to deport such seaman if required by such immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor to do so, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien seaman in respect of whom such failure occurs. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine, or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs.

(b) Proof that an alien seaman did not appear upon the outgoing manifest of the vessel on which he arrived in the United States from any place outside thereof, or that he was reported by the master of such vessel as a deserter, shall be prima facie evidence of a failure to detain or deport after requirement by the immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor.

(c) If the Secretary of Labor finds that deportation of the alien seaman on the vessel on which he arrived would cause undue hardship to such seaman he may cause him to be deported on another vessel at the expense of the vessel on which he arrived, and such vessel shall not be granted clearance until such expense has been paid or its payment guaranteed to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor.

(d) Section 32 of the immigration act of 1917 is repealed, but shall remain in force as to all vessels, their owners, agents, consignees, and masters, and as to all seamen, arriving in the United States prior to the enactment of this act. Sections 33 and 34 of such act are repealed, to take effect after the expiration of four months after the enactment of this act, but the provisions of such section 34 shall thereafter remain in force in the case of any alien seaman who has landed in a port of the United States before such repeal becomes effective.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY SENATOR KING DURING CONSIDERATION OF THE IMMIGRATION BILL IN THE SENATE, CALENDAR DAY, APRIL 18, 1924

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6858, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session]

SEC. 16. (a) Every alien employed on board of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof shall be examined by an immigrant inspector to determine whether or not (1) he is a bona fide seaman, and (2) he is an alien of the class described in subdivision (f), section 17, hereof; and by a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service to determine (3) whether or not he is suffering with any of the disabilities or diseases specified in section 35 of the immigration act of 1917.

(b) If it is found that such alien is not a bona fide seaman he shall be regarded as an immigrant, and the various provisions of this act and of the immigration laws applicable to immigrants shall be enforced in his case. From a decision holding such alien not to be a bona fide seaman the alien shall be entitled to appeal to the Secretary; and on the question of his admissibility as an immigrant he shall be entitled to appeal to the Secretary, except where exclusion is based upon grounds nonappealable under the immigration laws. If found inadmissible, such alien shall be deported, as a passenger, on a vessel other than that by which brought, at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and the vessel by which brought shall not be granted clearance until such expenses are paid or their payment satisfactorily guaranteed.

(c) If it is found that such alien is subject to exclusion under subdivision (f) of section 17 hereof, the inspector shall order the master to hold such alien on board pending the receipt of further instructions.

(d) If it is found that, although a bona fide seaman, such alien is afflicted with any of the disabilities or diseases specified in section 35 of the immigration act of 1917, disposition shall be made of his case in accordance with the provisions of the act approved December, 1920, entitled "An act to provide for the treatment in hospital of diseased alien seamen."

SEC. 17. (a) Upon the arrival—after the expiration of four months after the enactment of this act—of any vessel in the United States, it shall be the duty of the owner, agent, charterer, consignee, or master thereof to deliver to the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival, in respect of each alien seaman employed on such vessel, a landing card in duplicate, containing such seaman's name, age, nationality, personal description, and the capacity in which employed, and having permanently attached thereto a photograph of such seaman.

(b) If such alien employee is found upon examination not to be subject to detention or exclusion under any of the provisions of section 16 hereof, he shall be permitted temporarily to land during the stay of the vessel in port or for the purpose of reshipping on board any other vessel bound to a place outside the United States, and the immigration officer shall cause a fingerprint of the alien to be placed upon each copy of the landing card. Thereupon one copy of the landing card shall be delivered to said seaman, and the other copy shall be filed in the archives of the immigration office at the port of arrival and properly indexed for future reference.

(c) If such a temporarily landed alien seaman remains in the United States without reshipping foreign for a period in excess of 60 days, such circumstance shall constitute prima facie evidence of abandonment of calling and becoming an immigrant, and such alien shall thereupon be taken into custody by immigration officials and examined as though he were an immigrant applying for admission; and unless such alien shows either that he has not abandoned his calling but is still a bona fide seaman, or that he is in all respects admissible under this act and the immigration laws, such alien shall be deported in the manner prescribed by sections 19 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917.

(d) Landing cards shall be printed on distinctive safety paper prepared and issued, under regulations prescribed under this act, at the expense of the owner, agent, consignee, charterer, or master of the vessel. The Secretary of Labor, with the cooperation of the Secretary of State, shall provide a means of obtaining blank landing cards outside the United States.

(e) All vessels entering ports of the United States manned with crews engaged and taken on at foreign ports shall when departing from the United States ports carry a crew of at least equal number, and any such vessel which fails to comply with this requirement shall be refused clearance.

(f) No vessel shall enter a port of the United States, except in distress, having on board as a member of the crew any alien who if he were applying for admission to the United States as an immigrant laborer would be subject to exclusion under the Chinese exclusion laws, or under the sixth proviso to section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 and rule 7 of the immigration rules of February 1, 1924, or under the clause of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 excluding by territorial limitations certain natives of Asia and of islands adjacent thereto; except that any ship of the merchant marine of any one of the countries, islands, dependencies, or colonies immigrant laborers coming from which are excluded by the said provisions of law shall be permitted to enter ports of the United States having on board in their crews aliens of said description who are natives of the particular country, island, dependency, or colony to the merchant marine of which such vessel belongs. Any alien seaman brought into a port of the United States in violation of this provision shall be excluded from admission or temporary landing and shall be deported either to the place of shipment or to the country of his nativity, as a passenger, on a vessel other than that on which brought, at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and the vessel by which brought shall not be granted clearance until such expenses are paid or their payment satisfactorily guaranteed.

(g) The owner, agent, consignee, charterer, or master of the vessel who violates any of the provisions of this section shall pay to the collector of customs for the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien in respect of whom the violation occurs; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

Paragraph (c) is a repealing clause.

The following letter was submitted to Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON, chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House and one of the conferees on House Resolution 7995, and considered by the conference, namely:

APRIL 28, 1924.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON,
Chairman Committee on Immigration,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In dealing with the question of immigration no one could fail to note an effort on the part of the Department of Labor to acquire a right to hold alien seamen on board of the merchant vessels in our harbors in order to prevent the vessels from being the means of violations of the immigration and exclusion laws.

The early drafts of all the bills contained provisions under which the masters of vessels were to hold the seamen on board of the vessels and be penalized if they failed.

It evidently did not occur to the draftsmen that such legislation would be either cruel or unconstitutional. Unconstitutional for two reasons. First, because those men would be held to involuntary servitude within the jurisdiction of the United States. Second, because the vessels would be private prisons, and as such incompatible with the sovereignty of the United States. As it became apparent to the membership of the committees that any legislation to hold the seamen on the vessels against their will might be declared void, it was thought that it might be accomplished in some indirect manner, as in the House bill (line 25 on page 31, and lines 19, 20, 21, and 22 on page 33, conference committee print No. 1), or that it might be better to permit the coming of aliens as seamen, as in the Senate bill.

When, during the hearings on the bill, your attention was called to the real situation, you stated that to deal with the question of seamen in the effective way suggested by me might defeat the proposed legislation.

To that suggestion I answered by stating that if such was the case it would be better to leave the seamen as they are. While the seamen question is of importance the seamen will stand aside, and I would do nothing which might endanger the bill. I have kept that promise. The situation is now altered.

There is not now any danger to the legislation, except to its effectiveness by leaving a side door open through which excluded laborers may come in as great numbers as might be desired by either the steel corporation or the steamship companies.

The census year to be used, the percentage to be admitted legally, and the Japanese exclusion are in the same language in the House and the Senate bills. The majority with which the bills passed the separate Houses is such as to make any danger from any source practically unthinkable.

There is, however, nothing in either bill that will prevent vessels of any nation from bringing excluded aliens into our ports, where they can not be kept on board for reasons given above.

There is nothing in either bill to prevent vessels from coming here with 50 or even 100 per cent of men added to their crews, to drop the extra men here as illegal immigrants and then go away with just such men as they might retain on board.

That vessels will do this, when they can collect not only immigrant fares but in some instances $1,000 per person landed in the United States, will not be denied by any man with the ordinary amount of candor and respect for the truth.

That our supply of Chinese is kept up and added to in this manner, you will not question. That immigrants are coming from Europe in this way, you have been told in such manner that you can not doubt it. Here is a side door through which the law is to be violated, and to much greater extent than in the past. You can close this door if you so desire. There are no treaties to forbid. The Bureau of Immigration has withdrawn its objections and now has notified the conferees that it now looks upon the amendments offered by Senator KING as the one effective way proposed for the real enforcement of the law. The only known parties, that are now opposed, are the steamship companies. Are they going to be permitted to stand in the way until in some dim and distant future you can pass the separate bill, of which you spoke, but the reason for which has now passed away?

Most respectfully yours,

ANDREW FURUSETH.

The following letter by Mr. Furuseth was presented to Senator REED, a conferee on H. R. 7995 on the part of the Senate, and used by the conferees, which letter and memorandum are in words following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 5, 1924.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: From information which I have obtained it seems that the conferees on the immigration bill have tentatively agreed to sections 18, 19, and 20 of the House bill, which sections deal with the question of alien seamen in relation to immigration, without adding thereto subsections (e) and (f), as found in the amendment submitted by Senator KING.

I do most sincerely hope that no such agreement will be finally arrived at. It is a fact, not now disputed by anybody, that vessels are leaving our ports with a much smaller crew of seamen than they had on arrival. If subsection (e) is not made a part of the law, there will be nothing either in the maritime law or in the immigration law which would justify any protests on the part of our immigration authorities if a vessel coming here was to double her normal crew and leave one-half of that double crew behind her when she departs. That vessels will do this is as certain as the fact that men will do things that they are permitted to do if it is to their economic advantage.

About 165,000 immigrants will be admitted regularly. There is no reason anywhere in the law why that number can not be doubled and 330,000 brought here in violation of the spirit, but not of the letter, of the immigration law. Nothing can be more certain than that men will pay their passage, be placed on the articles of the ship, and do some work on the way over in order to ostensibly prove that they are seamen.

If subsection (f) is not adopted, there will be nothing in the law to prevent vessels coming from any foreign port or place bringing to the United States persons that are racially or territorially excluded from the United States and bringing them in such numbers as to make it worth while even to wealthy corporations. It is not now disputed by anybody that Chinese are paying $1,000 to be landed in the United States. That the same will henceforth apply to other orientals can not reasonably be questioned. The provisions for fines, as found in section 20, will have no force or effect, because the Government will have to prove collusion, and that can not be proved except in very rare instances, if at all.

But, bad as this is, it is not the worst. While the side door is left wide open to bring in all kinds of excluded people, the honest legitimate seaman is to be photographed and fingerprinted, like any convicted criminal, and the vessels are to be annoyed, subjected to delay, trouble, and expense by obtaining from the consul special papers for every alien on board and to cause him to be photographed. They are to be punished by fines for violating this provision. It will be the honest seaman that will be fingerprinted; the crook will refuse on the plea that he is not going ashore at all, and when night comes he will slip from the side and vanish. If the photographing and the fingerprinting were general, of course the seaman could not properly complain; but when the seaman is selected and put in the class with convicted crooks simply because he is a seaman and unfortunate enough to come within the jurisdiction of the United States, it is a dishonor put upon the seaman which will certainly not help the United States in getting efficient, self-respecting men or boys to serve at sea, whether they be of American or foreign parentage.

If the conferees could adopt (e) and (f), there would be no necessity for any landing card, because those specifically excluded would be picked up on the arrival of the vessel and deported. This would certainly be less annoyance to any vessel than to furnish photographs on special paper for every member of the crew, running from 20 to 700 men and women. If it be stated that it would be a hardship on the vessel to be prohibited from departing unless she had as many men in her crew as she had on arrival, I respectfully submit that that is the law dealing with American vessels, and you will find that in section 4463 of Revised Statutes, as finally amended in 1913.

I stated to the committee of the House and to the committee of the Senate that if proper workable immigration laws could not be placed in this bill the seamen would prefer to be left exactly as they are now. The adoption of the House sections does not leave the seamen as they are now. It makes at least the distinction of changing the seamen from being presumably as honest as everybody else to that of being in the class of convicted crooks. If it be true that the House provisions dealing with alien seamen are adopted or are to be adopted, it would be infinitely better to leave the bill on that question as it was adopted in the Senate.

On behalf of the seamen,
Most respectfully yours,

ANDREW FURUSETH.

Memorandum concerning changes which should be made in the seamen's sections of H. R. 7995 in order to make those sections fairly effective from the immigration standpoint and in order that this proposed law shall not result in repealing any provisions of the seamen's act.

[The print of the bill used in preparing this memorandum is conference committee print No. 6 of May 8, 1924]

As all provisions requiring the seamen to have landing cards and provisions relating to such landing cards have already been eliminated from the bill in conference through the deletion of each and every paragraph of section 20 thereof, these suggestions proceed upon the premise that the landing-card arrangement has been definitely abandoned.

Section 19 of the bill (lines 15–22, p. 29) should be stricken out, because the provisions thereof, treating alien seamen as though "excluded from admission into the United States under the immigration laws," are in direct conflict with the fifth clause of section 3 (lines 8–12, p. 5), excepting from the "definition of immigrant" any alien who is "a bona fide alien seaman serving as such on a vessel arriving at a port of the United States and seeking to enter temporarily the United States solely in the pursuit of his calling as a seaman." And in order that the bill may clearly show the extent to which and the purpose for which alien seamen are to be examined there should be inserted as section 19 the following:

"(a) Every alien employed on board of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof shall be examined by an immigrant inspector to determine whether or not (1) he is a bona fide seaman and (2) he is an alien of the class described in subdivision (f), section 20, hereof, and by a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service to determine (3) whether or not he is suffering with any of the disabilities or diseases specified in section 35 of the immigration act of 1917.

"(b) If it is found that such alien is not a bona fide seaman, he shall be regarded as an immigrant, and the various provisions of this act and of the immigration laws applicable to immigrants shall be enforced in his case. From a decision holding such alien not to be a bona fide seaman the alien shall be entitled to appeal to the Secretary, and on the question of his admissibility as an immigrant he shall be entitled to appeal to the Secretary, except where exclusion is based upon grounds nonappealable under the immigration laws. If found inadmissible, such alien shall be deported as a passenger on a vessel other than that by which brought, at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and the vessel by which brought shall not be granted clearance until such expenses are paid or their payment satisfactorily guaranteed.

"(c) If it is found that such alien is subject to exclusion under subdivision (d) of section 20 hereof, the inspector shall order the master to hold such alien on board pending the receipt of further instructions.

"(d) If it is found that although a bona fide seaman such alien is afflicted with any of the disabilities or diseases specified in section 35 of the immigration act of 1917, disposition shall be made of his case in accordance with the provisions of the act approved December 26, 1920, entitled 'An act to provide for the treatment in hospital of diseased alien seamen.'"

Strike out paragraph (a) of section 21 of the bill (line 11, p. 32, to line 4, p. 33) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 20. (a) The owner, charterer, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof who fails to detain on board any alien seaman employed on such vessel until such alien has been inspected pursuant to paragraph (a) of section 16 hereof, or until such alien has been placed in hospital pursuant to paragraph (d) of said section, or who fails to make provision for the deportation of any alien ordered deported pursuant to paragraph (b) of said section or pursuant to paragraph (c) of said section and paragraph (d) of this section, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien in respect of whom any such failure occurs. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine, or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs."

Strike out paragraphs (b) and (c) of section 21 (lines 5–19, p. 33), and change the designation of what is now paragraph (d) (line 20, p. 33) to (b).

Add to section 21 of the bill (after line 5, p. 34) three paragraphs to be designated and to read as follows:

"(c) All vessels entering ports of the United States manned with crews the majority of which, exclusive of licensed officers, have been engaged and taken on at foreign ports shall when departing from the United States ports carry a crew of at least equal number, and any such vessel which fails to comply with this requirement shall be refused clearance: Provided, however, That such vessel shall not be required when departing to carry in the crew any person to fill the place made vacant by the death or hospitalization of any member of the incoming crew.

"(d) No vessel shall, unless such vessel is in distress, bring into a port of the United States as a member of her crew any alien who if he were applying for admission to the United States as an immigrant would be subject to exclusion under paragraph (c) of section 13 hereof; except that any ship of the merchant marine of any one of the countries, islands, dependencies, or colonies immigrants coming from which are excluded by the said provisions of law shall be permitted to enter ports of the United States having on board in their crews aliens of said description who are natives of the particular country, island, dependency, or colony to the merchant marine of which such vessel belongs. Any alien seaman brought into a port of the United States in violation of this provision shall be excluded from admission or temporary landing and shall be deported either to the place of shipment or to the country of his nativity as a passenger on a vessel other than that on which brought at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and the vessel by which brought shall not be granted clearance until such expenses are paid or their payment satisfactorily guaranteed.

"(e) If any alien seaman temporarily landed under the provisions of this act remains in the United States without shipping foreign for a period in excess of 60 days, such circumstance shall constitute prima facie evidence of abandonment of calling and becoming an immigrant, and such alien shall thereupon be taken into custody by immigration officials and examined as though he were an immigrant applying for admission; and unless such alien shows either that he has not abandoned his calling but is still a bona fide seaman, or that he is in all respects admissible under this act and the immigration laws, such alien shall be deported in the manner prescribed by sections 19 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917."

The following letter and statement by Mr. Furuseth was submitted by me to the conferees while H. R. 7995 was under consideration. It follows:

MEMORIAL ON IMMIGRATION BILL, BY ANDREW FURUSETH, ON BEHALF OF THE SEAMEN

Section 19 places the seamen under the immigration laws. Immigration laws are defined as all acts, treaties, and conventions, including this act, dealing with immigration, exclusion, and expulsion of aliens, so that the seamen will, first, have to comply with all the provisions of the former immigration statutes, and in addition to that he must be capable of becoming a citizen of the United States under this proposed statute.

Section 21 provides that the master of a vessel must hold the seaman on board, first, until examined; second, until deported either by himself in the same ship or by order of the Secretary of Commerce in some other ship, unless the seaman shall be permitted to land. Having no immigration visé, of course he can not land in the United States under the immigration laws as they will be amended if these two sections are adopted. The failure of the master to hold the seaman to the vessel carries with it a penalty of $1,000.

Section 4 of the seamen's act was passed (1) to liberate the seamen, (2) to induce Americans to go to sea, and (3) to equalize the wage cost of foreign and American merchant vessels. It gives to the seaman the right to demand one-half of the wages earned, and if that is refused, to leave the vessel and apply to the courts for the payment of all the wages earned. This section of the seamen's act has been most seriously contested by foreign and domestic shipping companies. It finally came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dillon v. Strathearn (U. S. 232, p. 358). Great Britain appeared through amicus curiae. The United States was represented through the Department of Justice; and the Supreme Court unanimously held this section to be valid law.

Sections 19 and 21 of the immigration bill and section 4 of the seamen's act can not operate together, if the immigration laws and the seamen's act are both to be obeyed. If you do not desire to repeal section 4 of the seamen's act, sections 19 and 21 of this act must be deleted. The seamen were given a definite promise by the committees of both branches of Congress that no part of the seamen's act would be repealed.

Respectfully submitted.

ANDREW FURUSETH.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 13, 1924.

The following letter was sent by me to Secretary of State Hughes, and his reply thereto duly received. These were presented to the conferees and by them considered. My letter and Secretary Hughes's reply are as follows:

APRIL 23, 1924.

Hon. CHARLES E. HUGHES,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am sending you herewith a proposed amendment to sections 18 and 19 to the present pending immigration bill, H. R. 7995.

There are two provisions in the bill that I would like your opinion on, to see whether or not they are in conflict with any treaty now existing between the United States and any foreign country. The only questions really involved upon which I particularly call your attention are the provisions of subdivision (e) and (f) of the proposed amendment to section 19.

I would appreciate your reply to this at the earliest possible date, not later than Thursday evening, if possible.

I am sending this to Mr. Andrew Furuseth, whom I have requested to go over the matter with you, so that we may have a full and complete understanding on the subject. I want to know whether or not these two sections as written are workable, so far as our treaties are concerned.

Respectfully submitting the same and anticipating your early reply, believe me, I am

Most cordially yours,

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

ALIEN SEAMEN PROVISIONS IN H. R. 7995 AS PASSED BY THE HOUSE, WITH SUGGESTIONS RELATING THERETO FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND OTHERS—LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO HON. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

[Received April 24, 1924]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 24, 1924.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: I have received your letter of April 23 asking whether, in my opinion, subdivisions (e) and (f) of the proposed amendment of section 19 of the pending immigration bill, H. R. 7995, would be in conflict with any treaty now existing between the United States and a foreign country. The proposed provisions are as follows:

"(e) All vessels entering ports of the United States manned with crews the majority of which, exclusive of licensed officers, have been engaged and taken on at foreign ports shall when departing from the United States ports carry a crew of at least equal number, and any such vessel which fails to comply with this requirement shall be refused clearance.

"(f) No vessel shall, unless such vessel is in distress, bring into a port of the United States as a member of her crew any alien who if he were applying for admission to the United States as an immigrant would be subject to exclusion under paragraph (b) of section 12 hereof; except that any ship of the merchant marine of any one of the countries, islands, dependencies, or colonies immigrants coming from which are excluded by the said provisions of law shall be permitted to enter ports of the United States having on board in their crews aliens of said description who are natives of the particular country, island, dependency, or colony to the merchant marine of which such vessel belongs. Any alien seaman brought into a port of the United States in violation of this provision shall be excluded from admission or temporary landing and shall be deported either to the place of shipment or to the country of his nativity, as a passenger, on a vessel other than that on which brought, at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and the vessel by which brought shall not be granted clearance until such expenses are paid or their payment satisfactorily guaranteed."

Probably the countries which would be affected most by the proposed measures would be Great Britain, Japan, and the Netherlands.

I do not find anything in the treaty of commerce and navigation of 1852 with the Netherlands which seems to have any direct bearing upon this question.

Article I of the convention of commerce and navigation of 1815 with Great Britain reads as follows:

"There shall be between the territories of the United States of America, and all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers, in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively; also to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively."

Article I of the treaty of commerce and navigation of 1911 with Japan reads, in part, as follows:

"The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel, and reside in the territories of the other to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses, and ships, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established."

Article IV of the same treaty reads as follows:

"There shall be between the territories of the two high contracting parties reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation. The citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties, equally with the citizens or subjects of the most-favored nation, shall have liberty freely to come with their ships and cargoes to all places, ports, and rivers in the territories of the other which are or may be opened to foreign commerce, subject always to the laws of the country to which they thus come."

Provisions more or less similar to those quoted may be found in treaties with other countries.

Especial attention is called to the provisions in the treaties from which I have quoted relating to "reciprocal liberty of commerce" and "reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation." It appears to me that subdivision (e) of the proposed amendment of section 19 might operate in such a way as to interfere with reciprocal freedom or liberty of commerce and to cause serious loss to British and Japanese vessels, and perhaps vessels of other countries with which the United States has commercial treaties similar to those from which I have quoted. If, for example, a seaman on a vessel coming within the provisions of subdivision (e) should die or become ill and have to be taken to a hospital, or if one or more members of the crew should desert, immediately before the scheduled time for sailing, it is quite possible that a considerable time would be required to obtain other seamen to fill their places. It is quite conceivable that a delay of several hours or of a day or more might be required to fill the quota of the crew. In the case of a large vessel a delay of an hour or more may result in a very large loss. Therefore, if the proposed provision should be adopted, it would seem desirable to amend it in such a way as to make it less rigid. Perhaps this might be done by adding a provision to the effect that the Secretary of the Treasury should have authority to give the vessel clearance where the crew loss has occurred within a specified time before the scheduled time for sailing and where such loss has not been caused by the fault of the vessel. You may wish to consult with the Secretary of the Treasury concerning this point.

As to subdivision (f), there would seem to be no conflict with commercial treaties except, perhaps, in so far as it applies to seamen subject to exclusion under the immigration act as being ineligible to naturalization and coming from oversea dominions or colonies of the country to which the vessel belongs. This objection would not be apt to arise under the convention of commerce and navigation of 1815 between the United States and Great Britain, since that convention specifically applies to commerce between the territories of the United States of America and "all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe." However, the British Government might object upon the ground that the provision, as applied to Hindoos serving on British vessels plying between the United States and India, would be so unreasonable as to amount to a violation of international comity. The Japanese Government might object upon the ground that the application of this provision to Korean seamen serving on Japanese vessels would be a violation of the provisions of Articles I to IV of the treaty of commerce and navigation of 1911, quoted above. The Japanese Government might reasonably contend that the treaty provisions just mentioned guarantee the right of Japanese subjects, whether coming from Japan proper or from overseas dominions, to come to the United States for purposes of commerce and navigation, and that these provisions cover the seamen on a vessel as well as its owners and agents.

For the reasons mentioned above, it would seem desirable to have subdivision (f) amended in such a way as to avoid its application to seamen of the class mentioned coming from outlying dominions.

I am, my dear Mr. RAKER,

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

A letter to Secretary Davis and his reply thereto are as follows:

APRIL 30, 1924.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,

Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

In re: H. R. 7995.

MY DEAR MR. DAVIS: I am sending you herewith a printed copy of a letter to me from Secretary of State Hughes, of date April 24, 1924.

I wish you would take H. R. 7995, sections 18, 19, and 20 of the bill as it passed the House. Then we desire to add to section 19 two new subdivisions, which are marked in the letter from Secretary Hughes as "(e)" and "(f)." While we want to leave section 19 just as it stands, the subdivisions would be changed and "(e)" and "(f)" of the Hughes letter would be then different subdivisions, but what we want to know is whether or not you can see your way clear to add to section 19 of H. R. 7995 the provisions of "(e)" and "(f)," as found in the Hughes letter of April 24, 1924, copy of which I am submitting herewith.

I hope that I may have your favorable approval of these two subdivisions.

Respectfully submitting the same, I am

Yours most truly, JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington May 1, 1924.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: In the absence of the Secretary, I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 30, inclosing printed copy of letter from the Secretary of State, in which you ask whether subdivision (e) and (f) of Secretary Hughes's letter can be added to section 19 of H. R. 7995.

We have given section 19 and the proposed amendments careful consideration, and this department is of the opinion that if this section and the proposed amendments, with corrections, as suggested by Secretary Hughes, are adopted it will go far toward solving many of the difficulties with which this department has been confronted in its efforts successfully to cope with the seamen's situation as it pertains to the enforcement of the immigration laws. This being true, the proposed amendments meet with the approval of this department and are highly desirable from an administrative standpoint.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

ROBE CARL WHITE,
Acting Secretary.

The following is a letter to Mr. Carson, Commissioner Bureau of Navigation, and his reply thereto, namely:

APRIL 22, 1924.

Hon. D. B. CARSON,

Commissioner Bureau of Navigation, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER: I am sending you herewith proposed amendment—sections 18 and 19—to the present pending immigration bill, H. R. 7995.

There are two provisions in the bill that I would like your opinion on to see whether or not they are, first, against the contravention of the La Follette seaman's act, and, second, whether or not they are contrary to any treaties existing between the United States and any foreign governments, and, third, whether or not they would be in contravention of the law of the sea.

I would like your reply to this at the earliest possible date, not later than Thursday noon. If there is anything that is not plain here, I would be pleased to get in consultation with you and your office upon it.

I am sending this by Mr. Andrew Furuseth, whom I have requested to go over the matter with you, so that we may have a full and complete understanding on the matter. I want to know whether or not these two sections as written are workable, for the reasons suggested, or could there be any lawful or legal reasons why they would not be workable.

Respectfully submitting the same, I am

Yours most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

[Letter from the Department of Commerce received April 24, 1924]

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, April 23, 1924.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. RAKER: I have received your letter of the 22d instant inclosing proposed amendments of sections 18 and 19 of immigration bill, H. R. 7995. You inquire as to the bureau's opinion whether these amendments are in contravention of the seamen's act of March 4, 1915; whether they are contrary to any treaties existing between the United States and any foreign governments; and whether they are in contravention of the "law of the sea."

As I understand the proposed amendments, they are not in contravention of the seamen's act of March 4, 1915.

Whether these proposed amendments are in contravention of treaties of the United States appears to be for the consideration of the Department of State, and this bureau does not feel justified in going into that question.

The proposed addition at the end of line 11, page 25, to the effect that the immigration authorities may remove from vessels, foreign and American, any member of the crew found not to be a bona fide seaman in the opinion of the immigration officer, goes much further than any maritime law or practice with which this bureau is familiar.

The amendment which follows, identified as (e), does not appear to be in contravention of any of our navigation laws unless possibly it is contrary to the spirit of section 4400, Revised Statutes, which provides in effect that the United States is not to fix the number of crew which a foreign vessel shall carry inasmuch as section 4400 does not make 4463, Revised Statutes, as amended, applicable to foreign vessels. The bureau has not before it the law of any other maritime nation containing a similar requirement.

The amendment identified as (f), prohibiting any vessel bringing into a port of the United States an ineligible alien as a member of her crew with enumerated exceptions, extends much further than any legislation of any maritime country with which this bureau is familiar.

In making the above statements this bureau wishes it clearly understood that it is not in any sense approving or disapproving the amendments or endeavoring in any way to pass on the merits of such proposals.

Respectfully, D. B. CARSON, Commissioner.

The following is a letter to Mr. Jeremiah Hurley, Department of Labor, and his reply thereto, namely:

APRIL 24, 1924.

Mr. JEREMIAH HURLEY,
Department of Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HURLEY: I am sending you herewith House bill 7995 as it passed the House. I am calling your attention especially to sections 18 and 19 of said bill. First. A suggested amendment to add at the end of section 18, line 11, page 25, of the bill. Second. A new subdivision to be known as "E–1." Third. A new subdivision to be known as "F–1." These three are the controversial matters now pending.

I would like to have you make thorough and complete investigation and study of these proposed amendments separately and then collectively, and then determine whether or not either or all of them are workable and are not contrary to the seamen's act and would not be in contravention of any treaties. Further, is there any reason why such provisions should not be placed upon the immigration bill?

Kindly give this your best personal attention, preparing a written memoranda as follows:

1. Would like to have a letter from you on the subject as to your views.

2. If you can not do this, then have the above memoranda prepared so that if the conferees call you before them you will have something concrete and definite so that the conferees will have your views on the bill and suggested amendments to consider concretely and without scattering.

I am sending this letter by special messenger.

Respectfully submitting the same, I am,

Yours most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, April 26, 1924.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: As requested in your communication of the 24th instant, I have to state that I have made a careful study of the seaman's provisions contained in bill H. R. 7995 as it passed the House, together with the proposed amendments E and F.

In this connection, I am of the opinion that the proposed amendments E and F are both practicable and feasible, and if they are added to the seaman's provisions of the bill H. R. 7995 as it passed the House and then enacted into law, can be effectively administered under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor.

Very truly yours,

JEREMIAH J. HURLEY,
Special Representative (Seamen's Work).

The conferees amended the seamen's provisions of H. R. 7995—being sections 18, 19, and 20 thereof—and adopted the following amendments, which became sections 18 and 19 of the present immigration act of 1924, as follows:

ALIEN SEAMEN

SEC. 19. No alien seaman excluded from admission into the United States under the immigration laws and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe for the ultimate departure, removal, or deportation of such alien from the United States.

SEC. 20. (a) The owner, charterer, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof who fails to detain on board any alien seaman employed on such vessel until the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival has inspected such seaman—which inspection in all cases shall include a personal physical examination by the medical examiners—or who fails to detain such seaman on board after such inspection or to deport such seaman if required by such immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor to do so, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien seaman in respect of whom such failure occurs. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine, or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs.

(b) Proof that an alien seaman did not appear upon the outgoing manifest of the vessel on which he arrived in the United States from any place outside thereof, or that he was reported by the master of such vessel as a deserter, shall be prima facie evidence of a failure to detain or deport after requirement by the immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor.

(c) If the Secretary of Labor finds that deportation of the alien seaman on the vessel on which he arrived would cause undue hardship to such seaman, he may cause him to be deported on another vessel at the expense of the vessel on which he arrived, and such vessel shall not be granted clearance until such expense has been paid or its payment guaranteed to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor.

(d) Section 32 of the immigration act of 1917 is repealed, but shall remain in force as to all vessels, their owners, agents, consignees, and masters, and as to all seamen, arriving in the United States prior to the enactment of this act.

It is unfortunate that the seamen sections—sections 18, 19, and 20 of H. R. 7995—were not adopted as they passed the House, with the two added subdivisions set out in Secretary Hughes's letter of date April 24, 1924, with the amendment thereto suggested by Mr. Hughes.

This would have made the immigration provisions as they relate to alien seamen workable and effective. Good for the seaman and for his protection. Most effective as to preventing vessels bringing in large numbers of seamen who are not in fact bona fide seamen, and then leaving our ports with 10 to 25 per cent less seamen than they brought in. Using this method to land those not otherwise entitled to enter and remain in the United States.

The last or second subdivision referred to in Secretary Hughes's letter, if adopted, would have effectively stopped up the leak of those inadmissible entering the United States as is now practiced. It would have worked.

We are hoping at the convening of Congress that the alien seamen features above referred to may again be taken up and a proper, workable, and effective amendment adopted.

If the present provisions of the immigration act of 1924, sections 19 and 20, relating to alien seamen are enforced, and a full report made on outgoing as well as incoming alien seamen provided for in subdivision (b) of section 20 of said act, we will have the necessary facts and information upon which to make proper amendment to the alien seamen law as it relates to immigration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, last Monday we were informed by the gentleman from Washington that we would insult Japan if we passed the bill in its original form. The distinguished leader of the majority, the gentleman from Ohio, said that we would insult Japan and would not be acting gracefully if we passed the bill in that shape. The great keynoter of the Republican Party, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], informed us that it would be an absolute insult to the Government of Japan to pass this bill in its present shape. And yet on this day something has changed the insult into a decorous and most diplomatic manner of doing the thing. I wonder what brought the change about. I listened to the debate the other day and said to myself, the President has a right to be heard, he should be upheld, but none of these distinguished gentlemen who advocated the President's side on last Monday are standing up here to-day and advocating it now. You are running away from your President; you are betraying him; you are letting him flounder around without a single word of protest. This situation was created because the leaders of the Republican side were like men riding backwards in a hack. They did not see things until they were passed by.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. Did the gentleman vote to sustain the President the other day?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. No; I did not vote to sustain the President.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman's concern about the President is very recent? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The loyalty of the gentleman from Kansas to the President is of short duration.

The gentleman was with the President on Monday, and he leaves the President on Thursday, and I say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] that he will carry any load the Republican Party votes upon him, whether it be Jesse James with a load of loot from a plundered train or a prohibitionist with a bottle of nice, fresh, spring water for a fishing trip. [Laughter.] The gentleman is a fine pack horse for the Republican Party. He does not choose the road and he does not choose the load. He is not responsible. He is just a pack horse, faithful in body and absent in mind. [Laughter]. But here we are dealing with an international situation to-day, and yet the great Republican Party leader, the keynoter himself [Mr. BURTON], is silent. The keynote that he sounds at Cleveland will not be a stirring bugle call which will send a thrill through both the rider and the charger. It will sound more like the dinner bell rung by a landlady in a boarding house. It will sound like the dinner bell ringing on the ears of the delinquent boarders, who will rush hastily to feed heartily at the festive board against the hour of their eviction. It will recall to the radio fans that fine ballad:

> There is a boarding house three miles away
> Where they have ham and eggs three times a day;
> And when the boarders hear the bell,
> Downstairs they rush pell-mell
> Three times a day.

[Laughter.]

Oh, I feel sorry for the President; I feel sorry for him because he has a job that is too big for him. I feel sorry for him because he is convalescing even from his exertions as Vice President of the United States. I feel sorry for the President because he has no party and no loyalty behind him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, it is quite amusing to find gentlemen who never voted to sustain the President upon this or any other proposition to-day shedding crocodile tears over the situation of the President. It is also very suggestive and pertinent to observe that the opposition to the conference report comes from those men in this House who never have supported restrictive immigration of any kind.

Mr. WEFALD. Not altogether.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; you have changed your mind because you got orders from the Seamen's Union. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEFALD. I got no orders and I take no orders. I take no orders from Wall Street or Chicago.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But you take them now. I got the same thing in the mail this morning, just as the gentleman did; but it did not have the same effect upon me. I say this for myself: I voted last Monday to sustain the President, or, rather, to conform with what we understood to be his position in this matter. We do not know what the situation may be now. I am going to vote for this report because I am in favor of the restriction of immigration, and I am also in favor of the exclusion of Japanese immigration.

Mr. WEFALD. Because you have your orders.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, no, no.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not interrupt the speaker without first asking him to yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman knows I have voted consistently on this proposition; but I say this for myself and without orders from anybody: If the President in his wisdom finds after this legislation has been passed that it is impossible for him, in the discharge of his duty to the Nation and in the proper consideration of our international relations, to conform his conduct to this conference report, then I shall vote again to support the President. [Applause.] We have no information to-day that that situation exists, however. International relations change within less time than five days frequently. They change in a few hours, in a few minutes. Conferences and other situations may have created a different condition to-day than we had last Monday, but those who are in favor of restriction of immigration generally, and those who are in favor of Japanese exclusion specifically, will vote for this conference report to-day, and then await the future to bring whatever change there may be in the situation hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WATKINS].

[By unanimous consent, Mr. WATKINS was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, the old adage, "Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts," is just as true to-day as it was when first uttered and most apropos at this time. I want you to bear in mind that the men who will vote to recommit this bill vote with the express purpose, with malice aforethought as it were, and with the intent that that action will mean the death knell of legislation of this kind. There are but three substantial changes in this bill from that which passed the House, and I shall give you those in the hope that you will vote as you did before, because those three changes are changes in the interest of restriction and consequently improve the House bill. The gentleman from California, Judge RAKER, has explained the seaman's provision and I therefore shall not consume any time on it. This act is in addition to the regular immigration law. It is not a substitution therefor. The good of the old is retained.

The first change is the nonquota provision; this bill makes it stricter than it was before. We passed a bill putting the husband, the wife, the children, and the parents in the nonquota title. This bill has eliminated the father, the mother, and the husband. They must come in under the quota section, and so the only kinfolks that can enter under the nonquota provision are the children and the wife of an American citizen. There is not a single man in this House who voted for this bill before who can object to that change, because the Senate and the House conferees have made it better from the standpoint of America, and that is the only viewpoint I entertain.

The second change is section 6, which gives a preference to kin and to agriculturists. Heretofore the bill gave no such preference. Any man who wanted to come to America who could stand the test and pass the examination could come, if he could get a visé certificate. We now say that the kin, the father, the mother, and the husband, and agricultural people shall have the preference to the extent of 50 per cent. No man in this House who represents an American constituency can oppose that change, and every man who voted for the bill as it passed the House can with more justification vote for this conference report, but those who do not want any restrictive immigration, those who only want the present law with practically no restriction whatsoever, will vote to recommit the bill.

The third change in the national-origin section, which will not take effect until July 1, 1927. To vote to recommit this bill is to flirt with danger—that of no restriction of immigration whatever. The bill is not perfect, but it is a step forward in the interests of the United States and because of that interest challenges the support of every one of us who thinks in terms and tone of America. I urge your favorable vote. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the time has about expired. In reference to the alien seamen's provision, let me give you an exact statement of its purpose. It will work fairly for the United States and fairly for the sailors of the world. Seamen can not now be held on board ship even long enough to give them the medical examination necessary for the protection of the United States. We correct that situation.

It is charged that section 19 places the alien seamen under the immigration laws, and that to come ashore these seamen will have to comply with all the provisions of the immigration laws and be eligible to citizenship.

There is nothing to that charge. The provision excluding from admission aliens ineligible to citizenship by its own terms does not apply to any alien who is not an immigrant as defined in section 3. By the terms of section 3 bona fide seamen are expressly declared not to be immigrants. Therefore seamen are not prevented from landing under the Japanese-exclusion provision.

Next it is charged in a pamphlet signed by Andrew Furuseth on behalf of the seamen, that—

> Section 21 provides that the master of a vessel must hold the seaman on board, first, until examined; second, until deported either by himself in the same ship, or by order of the Secretary of Labor in some other ship, unless the seaman shall be permitted to land. Having no immigration visé, of course, he can not land in the United States under the immigration laws, as they will be amended if these two sections are adopted. The failure of the master to hold the seaman to the vessel carries with it a penalty of $1,000.

This is absolutely without foundation. The only person required to have an immigration visé is an immigrant. Section 3 expressly declares bona fide seamen not to be immigrants.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, a vote for this conference report is not a vote against the President of the United States. In bringing the report out in this form we acted in accord with the will of the House. The President in his right offered a suggestion. But the House and the Senate control immigration through law. Both House and Senate, if I may be permitted to speak plainly, are through with immigration treaties and are through with agreements. We hope the President may find a way to give proper notice of the abrogation within the very limited time given him, otherwise the burden is on Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit, which motion I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. SABATH moved to recommit the bill to the committee on conference with instructions on the part of the House not to agree to the Senate amendment with amendments comprehending paragraphs (b), (c), (d), and (e) of section 11 (known as the national-origin scheme), and with further instructions not to agree to paragraph (a), section 4, and to insist in lieu thereof on the following:
> "SEC. 4. (a) An immigrant who is the husband, wife, father, or mother, over 55 years of age, or unmarried child under 18 years of age of a citizen of the United States.
> "(2) An immigrant who is the husband, wife, or unmarried child under 18 years of age of an alien who has been;
>
> "(a) Legally and permanently admitted to the United States;
>
> "(b) Who has resided continuously for at least two years within the United States;
>
> "(c) Who has at least one year prior to July 1, 1924, filed a declaration of intention in the manner provided by law to become a citizen of the United States.
> "(3) An immigrant who is the wife, unmarried child under 18 years of age, father or mother over 55 years of age of one who served in the military or naval forces of the United States at any time between April 5, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and who was not discharged under dishonorable conditions."
>
> And with further instructions to disagree to sections 19 and 20 (known as the alien seamen's provisions) and in lieu thereof to agree on the following:
>
> "SEC. 19. (a) Every alien employed on board of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof shall be examined by an immigrant inspector to determine whether or not (1) he is a bona fide seaman, and (2) he is an alien of the class described in subdivision (d), section 20, hereof; and by a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service to determine (3) whether or not he is suffering with any of the disabilities or diseases specified in section 35 of the immigration act of 1917.
> "(b) If it is found that such alien is not a bona fide seaman, he shall be regarded as an immigrant and the various provisions of this act and of the immigration laws applicable to immigrants shall be enforced in his case. From a decision holding such alien not to be a bona fide seaman the alien shall be entitled to appeal to the Secretary; and on the question of his admissibility as an immigrant he shall be entitled to appeal to the Secretary, except where exclusion is based upon grounds nonappealable under the immigration laws. If found inadmissible, such alien shall be deported as a passenger on a vessel other than that by which brought, at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and the vessel by which brought shall not be granted clearance until such expenses are paid or their payment satisfactorily guaranteed.
> "(c) If it is found that such alien is subject to exclusion under subdivision (d) of section 20 hereof, the inspector shall order the master to hold such alien on board pending the receipt of further instructions.
>
> "(d) If it is found that, although a bona fide seaman, such alien is afflicted with any of the disabilities or diseases specified in section 35 of the immigration act of 1917, disposition shall be made of his case in accordance with the provisions of the act approved December 26, 1920, entitled 'An act to provide for the treatment in hospital of diseased alien seamen.'
>
> "SEC. 20. (a) The owner, charterer, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any place outside thereof who fails to detain on board any alien seaman employed on such vessel until such alien has been inspected pursuant to paragraph (a) of section 19 hereof, or until such alien has been placed in hospital pursuant to paragraph (d) of said section, or who fails to make provision for the deportation of any alien ordered deported pursuant to paragraph (b) of said section or pursuant to paragraph (c) of said section and paragraph (d) of this section, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each alien in respect of whom any such failure occurs. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the liability to the payment of such fine or while the fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine or of a bond with sufficient surety to secure the payment thereof approved by the collector of customs.
> "(b) Section 32 of the immigration act of 1917 is repealed, but shall remain in force as to all vessels, their owners, agents, consignees, and masters, and as to all seamen arriving in the United States prior to the enactment of this act. Sections 33 and 34 of such act are repealed, to take effect after the expiration of four months after the enactment of this act, but the provisions of such section 34 shall thereafter remain in force in the case of any alien seaman who has landed in a port of the United States before such repeal becomes effective.
> "(c) All vessels entering ports of the United States manned with crews, the majority of which, exclusive of licensed officers, have been engaged and taken on at foreign ports shall, when departing from the United States ports, carry a crew of at least equal number, and any such vessel which fails to comply with this requirement shall be refused clearance: Provided, however, That such vessel shall not be required when departing to carry in the crew any person to fill the place made vacant by the death or hospitalization of any member of the incoming crew.
> "(d) No vessel shall, unless such vessel is in distress, bring into a port of the United States as a member of her crew any alien who, if he were applying for admission to the United States as an immigrant, would be subject to exclusion under paragraph (c) of section 13 hereof, except that any ship of the merchant marine of any one of the countries, islands, dependencies, or colonies, immigrants coming from which are excluded by the said provisions of law shall be permitted to enter ports of the United States having on board in their crews aliens of said description who are natives of the particular country, island, dependency, or colony to the merchant marine of which such vessel belongs. Any alien seaman brought into a port of the United States in violation of this provision shall be excluded from admission or temporary landing and shall be deported either to the place of shipment or to the country of his nativity as a passenger on a vessel other than that on which brought, at the expense of the vessel by which brought, and the vessel by which brought shall not be granted clearance until such expenses are paid or their payment satisfactorily guaranteed.

"(e) If any alien seaman temporarily landed under the provisions of this act remains in the United States without shipping foreign for a period in excess of 60 days, such circumstance shall constitute prima facie evidence of abandonment of calling and becoming an immigrant, and such alien shall thereupon be taken into custody by immigration officials and examined as though he were an immigrant applying for admission, and unless such alien shows either that he has not abandoned his calling but is still a bona fide seaman, or that he is in all respects admissible under this act and the immigration laws, such alien shall be deported in the manner prescribed by sections 19 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the motion to recommit is against the rules of the House, as it contains instructions to the conferees that are without the scope and limit of the conferees on matters which were not in conference at all; and for that reason the motion to recommit is not proper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order; everything is in conference. The gentleman from Washington moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SABATH. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 246.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. There are far more than a quorum present.

Mr. SABATH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. Twenty-nine gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I join in that request.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 308, nays 62, not voting 63, as follows:

Mr. BEERS. No; I was not. I was out.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

CHARGES AGAINST TWO REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the report of the select committee appointed on March 12, 1924, to investigate the charges against two Representatives in Congress, and I ask that the same be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the report be read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHARGES AGAINST TWO REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

The select committee appointed March 12, 1924, pursuant to House Resolution 217, to investigate the statement contained in a report of a grand jury for the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, southern division, relative to certain evidence presented to them involving the payment of money to two Members of Congress and to ascertain—

(a) Whether said "two Members of Congress" so charged are Members of the House of Representatives; and

(b) If so, to make such further investigation as may be essential to establish the truth or falsity of said allegation;

and, further, to "report to the House as promptly as possible the results of its inquiries, together with such recommendation as it may deem advisable," now submits its report, as follows:

Your committee upon mature deliberation determined that the hearings should be in executive session, but that all of the evidence should accompany the report. It was formally ascertained that the Members referred to were Representatives FREDERICK N. ZIHLMAN, of Maryland, and JOHN W. LANGLEY, of Kentucky.

It was agreed by the committee that in view of the indictment and probable immediate trial in the District of Columbia of Representative LANGLEY, the committee would first consider the Zihlman case. Since then Representative LANGLEY has been indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced in the Federal court for the eastern district of Kentucky. It is understood that he has initiated appellate proceedings, and therefore it would seem proper that further action by the committee in respect to him be deferred for the present, it being assumed that until the final disposition of the case he will take no part whatever in any of the business of the House or its committees.

The committee has considered the Zihlman case. It has secured the testimony of all persons supposed to have any direct or indirect knowledge of the charge against him. It has examined 22 witnesses and a number of documents, and the printed record, containing some 828 pages, accompanies this report. The evidence is conflicting and sharply contradictory, and the question of the credibility of individual witnesses has frequently arisen. Taken as a whole, in the opinion of the committee the evidence does not establish the truth of the charge against Representative ZIHLMAN, and, accordingly, the committee recommends that, so far as he is concerned, no further action is required or should be taken by the House.

THEODORE E. BURTON.
FRED S. PURNELL.
EARL C. MICHENER.
OTIS WINGO.
R. WALTON MOORE.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I file at this time a copy of the testimony taken in the case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio files a copy of the testimony.

Mr. BURTON. As I understand it, this report takes its place on the calendar of the House, and no motion for adoption or rejection is in order unless called up as a privileged matter; and if such motion should be made, it is the feeling of the committee that the membership of the House should have time to examine the testimony if they so desire.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I would like to ask if the report submitted by the committee is signed by the entire membership?

Mr. BURTON. It is.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like to suggest that the gentleman inform the Members of the House of the fact that copies of the evidence will be available to all the Members of the House.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to call this up any more?

Mr. BURTON. That must await developments. I will say further that the precedents do not sustain the position that a motion should be made to adopt or reject. I was a member of a special committee in 1904 to investigate certain matters in the Post Office Department. A majority report and a minority report were filed, but there was no motion made to adopt or reject the reports.

RENT COMMISSION

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7962) to extend for a period of two years the provisions of Title II of the food control and the District of Columbia rents act, approved October 22, 1919, as amended, with Senate amendments, and move to agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I did everything within the scope of parliamentary rules to prevent the passage of this bill extending the Rent Commission. But it passed. In its present shape it extends the law for only one year from May 22, 1924. If it should go to conference its provisions might be changed so as to extend the Rent Commission several years longer.

The situation is this: The author of the Rent Commission law over in the Senate now has pending there a bill to make this commission permanent, with the salaries of the personnel raised, and embracing other wasteful, extravagant provisions. If this bill should go to conference he will be one of the conferees, and in fact would preside as chairman over the conference.

Our colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. LAMPERT], who introduced this measure in the House, introduced it as extending the act only for a stated number of years and increasing personnel, salaries, and expenses, but in the RECORD he has frankly expressed himself as favoring a permanent commission. And if this bill goes to conference, he will be one of the conferees.

Our fight against this bill in the House forced it to be reframed and restricted to a mere extension of the present law for one year, without any additional personnel and without any raises in salaries, and without increased expenses.

We can stop this evil where it is by accepting the minor amendments of the Senate and in thus letting it become a law without sending it back to conference. If it should go to conference, the probabilities are that there would be five conferees in favor of continuing this Rent Commission on for several years, with increased expenses; and I would be the only conferee against the measure, and I would be outvoted, and the conferees would probably be able to get the House and Senate to adopt their report. Hence through strategy I am going to let well enough alone and accept the least of possible evils and try to keep this bill from going to conference.

Therefore I proposed to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROS] and to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LAMPERT] that if they would move to accept the Senate amendments and thus finally pass the bill as it now stands, I would not resort to any parliamentary prerogatives to delay it. And they accepted my proposals, and therefore I will vote with them to accept the Senate amendments. And thus we thereby limit the life of this unwarranted, unconstitutional Rent Commission to one year only.

The Supreme Court of the United States has already advised that it would hold this law unconstitutional. Based on such opinion, a member of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has indicated that he will grant an injunction against this Rent Commission from functioning. And this surely will be done. Thus our colleagues who have forced the passage of this unconstitutional measure through Congress will have the satisfaction of soon witnessing these five rent commissioners and all of their employees drawing their salaries from the Public Treasury for a whole year and having nothing whatever to do and performing no service whatever for the pay they will receive, for the courts will not let them function. The President of the United States ought to retire them and save this money for the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, this bill has come back from the committee on conference a little worse, if possible, than it was when it went to conference. Another branch of Congress has added legislative matter to the bill which, if a motion were made to add the same on the floor of the House, would be subject to a point of order, and the point of order would be sustained.

It seems to me that those in the House who are opposed to the general proposition that Congress shall have the power to override the decisions of the Supreme Court—those men who believe that is contrary to the traditions of our Government and to the best interests of the Nation as a whole, should, as a matter of principle, vote against this report.

It not only extends the life and the powers of the Rent Commission so far as it may govern apartment houses, but another section has been added which makes it applicable to hotels and goes even further and includes food as well as lodging. Where are you going to stop? Some of us who have to pay a high price for clothing would like to have it brought in under the provisions of this bill, in fact, every necessity of life might just as well be included, and because most luxuries nowadays are considered necessities by most of the people, we might include everything.

I did not want this report accepted without making a protest, a protest made in all sincerity, not that it affects me in any way, shape, or manner, but that the principle laid down and the policy pursued are absolutely wrong fundamentally and absolutely wrong constitutionally.

If I were a lawyer instead of a layman, I would hate to stake my reputation as a lawyer on my individual opinion in comparison with the decision practically made by the Supreme Court in this matter. You write yourselves down either as believing your opinion is supreme and superior to that of the judgment of the Supreme Court or that you approve of the proposition which will come before Congress sooner or later, backed by all the radical elements of this Nation, namely, that Congress shall have the power to supersede the Supreme Court in its decisions.

Now, that is the situation, and if you vote honestly according to your own light and your own judgment—I mean mentally honest—the responsibility is yours and not mine. As for me, a common, ordinary laymen, with more or less respect, in fact, more than less respect for the Supreme Court, I propose to vote against the proposition.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, this proposition is a good reason and furnishes a fair example of why certain publications criticize Congress.

The first proposition contained in the conference report has been passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I will not at this time discuss it. It will not be effective because the courts have enjoined the enforcement of it.

The second proposition has had no consideration whatever. However, it has been tried in a great many places, and it has brought about a raise of rates by hotels in every State where it has ever been tried. If there is any place in the world where it will not work, it is in the District of Columbia, because here the transient is more or less permanent and the hotels are constructed in a way that some of us use apartments. But every room under this will have to have the rates published, whether you use it with the bath or without the bath or whether two or three Congressmen come here in the summer time and have two rooms with a bath between. The rate will be published, and of necessity the hotel man will protect himself by publishing a high rate in the room.

I can not conceive how Congress can be disappointed when magazines criticize us if we agree to take up a proposition like this and pass it without one witness testifying before any committee, but simply because some one man in some body offered it as an amendment.

I have no interest save and except that I want to be understood as being one Member of Congress who did not vote for this kind of legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman from Kansas would be willing to do what I am going to do, accept the lesser of two evils. If the bill goes to conference, you will have five conferees for two years and one for no year, and the two years will probably be adopted.

Mr. TINCHER. I am not going to accept any evil without a protest. I intend to vote against the acceptance of this conference report, and I shall not be mad if every publication in America condemns the act of a Congress which will take such hasty action on such important matters.

There are only two reasons advanced, and the second one has had no hearing and no one knows anything about it, and if you will investigate you will find it wrong; and the first proposition that we are adopting has been held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court and by the courts of the District.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. No; I do not yield.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, the only purpose of saying anything on the question of the acceptance of the bill with the Senate amendments is, perchance, there may be somebody who does not clearly understand just what this provision does.

In the first place, the House overwhelmingly passed an extension of the rent act for two years. The Senate amended that and made it one year, and the proponents of the measure are willing to accept that amendment.

Now, why accept a one-year amendment? The Supreme Court has rendered a decision that at least puts some question of doubt on its ultimate action. This doubt hinges entirely on whether or not the actual fact of an emergency is found to exist. In the Supreme Court of the District the other day, before Justice Stafford, an injunction was sought on the ground there was no emergency. Within 48 hours the Department of Justice had an attorney before that court arguing for a little extension of time to prove that an emergency exists. Let us assume it is found that no emergency exists. We are not making a spectacle of ourselves at all in extending a law which the Congress has twice overwhelmingly passed. So there is not anything to be excited about or embarrassed about in voting for an extension for one more year on the ground that perchance the Supreme Court may find that there is not any need for the law on the ground that there is no emergency.

There will be established legally whether or not there is an emergency, through the courts; and if it is established that there is an emergency, and we, on the advice of some of the opponents of this bill, refuse to recognize the fact that there is an emergency, I submit to you that we are throwing ourselves open to greater criticism than if we go ahead and extend the time one year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Briefly; because I only want to take one more minute.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not want to leave the impression that the court has the power to decide whether there is an emergency?

Mr. BEGG. No; not entirely. The gentleman from Ohio tried to make an argument on that when the bill was before the House, and I do not want to consume the time of the House on that matter now. The court has undertaken to ascertain that fact in an injunction suit and that question will be brought up.

As to the hotel rates, there is not a thing to be alarmed at in the provision regarding the publicity of the rates charged for the rent of rooms in commercial hotels. My distinguished colleague from Toledo, General SHERWOOD, knows—and every other Ohio man knows—that every single room in the hotels of that State, when you walk into them, has hanging on the door a little card with the laws of the State of Ohio, and the card says "the rate of this room is $3.50 per day or $5 per day or $7 or $2," or whatever the rate is. Now, there is not any hardship on the hotel management in that proposition, either. If the hotel wants to charge $5 for a $2 room, the buyer of that room for the day has a right to know the rate, and he has the right to have that rate in a public place so that he does not pay that rate and the next man the next night pay $2. Therefore there is not anything to be scared about on that proposition, and I hope the House will accept the amendments and adopt the bill.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present and ask for a roll call on the vote.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order comes too late on the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair did not notice the gentleman or he would have recognized him. The Chair assumes the gentleman was ready to make the point of order although it was after the Chair had made the announcement.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I was on my feet ready to make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the vote on the amendments or on adoption as amended?

The SPEAKER. On the adoption of the amendments.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the count long enough to make another parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the result of the adoption of the amendments—that would be the final vote, would it?

The SPEAKER. It would. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-nine Members present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 287, nays 52, answered "present" 1, not voting 93, as follows:

On motion of Mr. LAMPERT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendments were agreed to, was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD which I made on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE CONFERENCE REPORT ON THE IMMIGRATION BILL

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the immigration bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the immigration bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, to-day by a vote of 308 to 62, with none voting "present," and 63 absent, the House finally passed the immigration act. I was one of the 62 who voted finally against the bill. I have already fully expressed my objections to this bill, which have caused me to vote consistently against the bill, and to vote with those who desired to support the President on the Japanese question.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the following editorial from the Sun, of Baltimore:

[From the Sun, May 11, 1924]

STAND TO YOUR GUNS, MR. PRESIDENT

Apparently President Coolidge has been defeated in his efforts to amend the immigration bill so that the Japanese exclusion question could be taken up diplomatically and adjusted in a spirit of mutual courtesy and forbearance.

The action of the House in rejecting the proposal to extend the effective date of Japanese exclusion to March 1, 1925, seems to be conclusive. The Senate and House conferees in charge of the bill were willing to extend the date, after conferences with the President in which the facts of the problem were treated candidly, but the significance of that fact was as nothing to the House. And in the light of the House's course support of the President in the Senate, which probably would have been reluctant at best, may feel itself futile and disappear.

If, as now seems certain, the immigration bill goes to the President with the Japanese exclusion provision as originally written, the President can do no less than veto it, although it will be recognized by all that his situation will be difficult and that, in a sense, he will be confronted by an unfair political risk.

He has worked hard to put sense into the heads of Members of Congress and has failed to find enough heads that can be filled with sense. There is some doubt whether a veto would be sustained. Consequently, in asking that he veto the bill, it is asked that he pursue a policy which may have no parliamentary effect. And at the same time it may have a far-reaching political effect, for it would be likely to injure the President on the Pacific coast in the fall campaign.

That is a tough bullet for the President to chew. But the country has the right to ask him to chew it, and it will be warranted in grave disappointment if he does not do so.

The reason is this: Should Congress maintain to the end the vicious attitude it has adopted in this Japanese exclusion question, the one way in which the American people can make plain to Japan the undoubted fact that Congress does not voice intelligent American opinion is through a presidential veto. If the veto should be sustained, so much the better. But if it should be overridden there will have been a presidential demonstration of simple decency toward a great neighbor nation that, backed as it will be by the best thought of the land, may do much to reduce the evil that Congress has wrought.

Only one word is to be used in describing the almost solid line-up of the Democrats of the House against the extension desired by the President. That word is "shameful." To introduce partisanship into the treatment of this question is a sin against the Nation and against its youth. The Democrats have been complimented on their ability in this session to act as a coherent party. In the fight on Friday they prostituted that ability. The fact of prostitution is emphasized by the refusal of WALTON MOORE of Virginia, probably the ablest and soundest man on the Democratic side, to follow his party. Mr. MOORE and the handful of other Democrats who voted with the President honored themselves.

I hope the President will veto the immigration bill. If he does so veto this bill I shall vote to support his veto.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

VACATING CERTAIN STREETS AND ALLEYS

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 114) vacating certain streets and alleys and authorizing the widening and extension of Fourteenth Street, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 114, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Maryland knows that the House by an emphatic vote placed a certain amendment in this bill. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not the House may be assured that before any change is made in that action the House will have an opportunity to pass on the question.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. There are about 10 amendments to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I refer to the McKenzie amendment.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. There were four or five McKenzie amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the one that refers to the double track for street cars going through the Walter Reed Hospital.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman from Texas will be one of the conferees.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; I have served on the conference committee, and we receded from about 60 out of 68 amendments.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That was the gentleman's first experience; and the most of them he agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. I agreed with those that did not conflict with what I knew the House was in favor of. But we ought to have some understanding that these matters will be brought back to the House if there is to be any change of them. It would not be treating the House right not to bring them back.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It will, of course, come back to the House.

Mr. MURPHY. Reserving the right to object, I want to press that a little further. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will take care of that situation in conference. If they do not agree, will the gentleman bring it back and give us a chance to vote on it?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman knows that the conferees will represent the will of the House and the conferees of the Senate will represent the will of the Senate, but before the House conferees recede we will give the House an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman says that the conferees will not recede wtihout giving the House a chance to act on it?

Mr. ZILHMAN. There is a number of amendments.

Mr. MURPHY. Oh, I refer to the one mentioned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to close the streets through Walter Reed Hospital. That is the one we are interested in. All we want is an assurance that the gentleman will give us a chance to vote on that without agreeing to it in conference.

Mr. ZILHMAN. As one of the conferees I agree that before the House recedes——

Mr. MURPHY. On that particular amendment.

Mr. ZILHMAN. That is embodied in a number of amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. It is the main car line amendment.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman knows exactly what we are trying to do, and we want his assurance because we know him to be an honorable gentleman.

Mr. ZILHMAN. I shall bring it back to the House for its approval.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the Chair will appoint the following conferees: Mr. ZIHLMAN, Mr. LAMPERT, and Mr. BLANTON.

There was no objection.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the immigration bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, everyone giving consideration to the question has appreciated the need, particularly since the World War, for restrictive immigration legislation. Otherwise America would simply be overwhelmed with immigrants from every land desiring to escape conditions abroad. The growth of our own population and the necessity for preserving the true spirit of Americanism, as well as the traditions, institutions, and Government of our country, demand not only more care in the selection of immigrants but also require that such immigration shall be restricted to the minimum in order that the United States may not be overwhelmed and overcrowded by an unlimited number of aliens seeking to establish themselves here.

The Johnson immigration bill, for which I voted, and which I believe is the best measure obtainable at this time, provides for a 2 per cent quota based upon the census of 1890. This measure reduces the quota from 3 per cent to 2 per cent and thereby reduces the number of immigrants in any one year from 351,803 to an estimated number of 161,184, or over 50 per cent.

The Immigration Committee of the House of Representatives, which gave this question long and most serious consideration after the most extensive hearings, reported the Johnson immigration bill as a measure needed for the country and aimed not only to insure a better type of immigrant by providing as far as possible for examination and selection in the country from which the immigrant comes, but also by providing a system of certificates and consular visés of passports which will operate to prevent steamship companies bringing to America a large number of aliens who through disease or otherwise are ineligible for admission to the United States, but who suffer great hardships and face ultimate deportation.

One of the great problems to-day facing this country is the assimilation of those who come from foreign countries to our shores—particularly is this true in the great cities and manufacturing centers of the United States—and our first duty is to provide for a proper appreciation, understanding, and adoption by them of the principles of government, history, and traditions of our country, so that they may thoroughly identify themselves with it and become true Americans in every sense of the word.

America is made up of peoples who have either emigrated themselves from various countries of the world or who are descendants of such emigrants. Out of this composite type has sprung the greatest nation in the world and a virile and strong spirit of Americanism characterized by love of country and its institutions, and a generous and considerate disposition toward all the world.

The question of the extent to which further immigration is to be sanctioned is purely a domestic question with which foreign nations have absolutely no concern whatever. It is one to be determined solely by the American people, and when that determination has been made no foreign country has just ground for complaint.

It is entirely within the right of the American people to say who shall and who shall not be admitted, and the admission of some and exclusion of others can give no just grounds for offense or constitute any basis for a claim of discrimination. Every other nation reserves to itself a similar right, and America does not challenge its existence. I am sure that the American people will never relinquish their undisputed right to determine for themselves who may or may not be admitted to the United States, for the question is too vital and rests upon rights which no foreign nation is entitled to challenge.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, those who oppose acts of Congress restricting immigration talk much about regulating this important problem by treaties or agreements. These suggestions come from several groups favoring the liberal admission of alien peoples, but I have never heard or read them from those who fear and seek to guard against the peril which arises from the migrations of all the tongues and tribes of the earth to America.

Since the Johnson bill has been pending, one writer, voicing violent opposition to the legislation, has declared that the migrations of men should be regulated by international agreements in connection with the League of Nations, or some similar agency, on the ground that immigrants are international population. It is said that the prejudices of the people of one country should not prompt them to exclude the home-seeking millions who are fleeing from the miseries of other countries. America's policy in this heretofore has been to consult the present and future interests of her own people. She has claimed and usually exercised an exclusive, unlimited right to do that. Even the moving multitudes have not been allowed to have their wishes and interests prevail over the interests of those already in America. Nor have we admitted the demand of the overcrowded countries of the Old World that they have a free hand to solve their problems of overcrowding by sending their undesirable surplus to us.

It is frequently insisted that the League of Nations should control migrating populations, helping them to secure admission into the country of their selection and protecting them from the opposition usually called prejudice which confronts them. Those who urge this proposition want a league of Europeans and Asiatic nations who are suffering from overcrowding to have power to procure the admission of migrating population to the United States, where they are trying to come. Neither President Wilson nor any other responsible American advocate of the League of Nations has favored passing to it the control of America's immigration policy. European and Asiatic nations would like to see that done. Spokesmen for their people already admitted here have urged it frequently during recent years. The suggestion will never be tolerated by the American people.

There remains, then, the question whether our immigration policy will be controlled by treaties or agreements between us and foreign countries or by Congress. Treaties regularly made by the President and ratified by the Senate are in a class apart from mere agreements made by the Executive with foreign powers without "the advice and consent of the Senate." The "gentlemen's agreement" belongs to the latter class.

Italy, in its note of September 15, 1921, to Mr. Secretary Hughes, suggested that its emigration, which, of course, is America's Italian immigration, "be made the subject of a specific agreement beforehand, as already suggested." This suggestion no doubt expresses the wish of other foreign governments. I point out two specific reasons why America's immigration policy should not be regulated by the treaty-making power.

Our experience as to the attitude of our Presidents toward this problem should warn us of the danger of passing absolute or chief control of it to him. The President's constant contact with delicate and difficult questions of our foreign relations and the necessity of maintaining cordial intercourse with foreign countries expose him and his advisers and agencies to constant pressure toward a tendency to too great liberality in immigration laws and regulations. Our people now almost unanimously agree that we have heretofore been ruinously loose in our immigration policies; but even such restrictive measures as have been adopted in the past have nearly all been enacted in the face of executive opposition. Nearly every step forward has been in spite of the President's veto.

In 1879 President Hayes vetoed the first Chinese exclusion act. In 1882 President Arthur vetoed an act suspending Chinese immigration for a period of 20 years (Immigration Commission Report, vol. 2, pp. 580–581). On March 3, 1897, President Cleveland vetoed an immigration act excluding illiterates (2 I. C. R. 573). President Taft vetoed an immigration bill in 1913 containing a restriction against the admission of illiterates (RECORD, special session 59th Cong. p. 101). In 1917 President Wilson vetoed an act excluding illiterates, but Congress passed it over his veto. The present percentage quota immigration law was first passed by the Sixty-sixth Congress, but failed because President Wilson withheld his approval. It was again passed by the Sixty-seventh Congress and later extended, both acts having been approved by President Harding, whose action on these measures was about the first approval by a President of the United States of any measure designed to reduce or strictly regulate immigration from foreign countries.

The treaty between the United States and China, called the Burlingame treaty, concluded July 28, 1868, and proclaimed February 5, 1870, volume 1, Treaties and Conventions, page 234, Article V, contains the following language:

> The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents.

Article VI of the same treaty contains the following provision:

> Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most-favored nation; and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most-favored nation. * * *

Intolerable conditions soon developed in California as the result of this treaty stipulation that Chinese had an inalienable right to immigrate to the United States and permanently reside here, but the treaty-making power failed to relieve the situation. In 1879 a bill was introduced in Congress limiting to 15 the number of Chinese who could come into the United States upon any one vessel. It was argued against this bill that it would abrogate the provisions of the Burlingame treaty. After being amended by adding a provision for the abrogation of articles 5 and 6 of that treaty, which gave to the Chinaman all privileges enjoyed by "citizens or subjects of the most-favored nations," the bill passed the House January 28, 1879, by a vote of 155 to 72, and on February 15 it passed the Senate by a small majority. On March 1, 1879, President Hayes returned it with his veto, declaring that history gave no other instance where a treaty had been abrogated by Congress, and that it was not competent to modify a treaty by cutting out certain sections; and even if it were constitutional, seeing that China would probably assent willingly to such a modification, he thought it better policy to wait for the proper course of diplomatic negotiations.

Chinese immigration continued and conditions grew worse on the Pacific coast, but Congress failed to pass that bill over the President's veto. But under the threat of congressional action the Chinese Government, in 1880, agreed to another treaty, which was proclaimed October 5, 1881, Article I of which was as follows:

Whenever in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects or threatens to affect the interests of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations. Legislation taken in regard to Chinese laborers will be of such a character only as is necessary to enforce the regulation, limitation, or suspension of immigration, and immigrants shall not be subject to personal maltreatment or abuse.

It will be noted that this article limits the right of the United States to deal with Chinese immigration according to its will, giving it the privilege of dealing reasonably with the immigration of laborers, but forbids it to absolutely prohibit their coming, and forbids it to deal with other classes.

After the treaty of 1880 was concluded, a bill to execute certain stipulations contained therein was passed by the Senate and House. As this bill went to the President for approval it provided that within 90 days after its passage, and until 20 years thereafter, the coming of Chinese laborers should be suspended. Exception was made to Chinese laborers who were in the United States on November 17, 1880, and those who should come before the act went into effect.

Skilled Chinese laborers were specifically among those excluded, and all State or United States courts were denied the right to admit Chinese to citizenship. On April 4, 1882, President Arthur returned the bill with his veto, his principal reason for refusing to sign it being that the passage of an act prohibiting immigration for 20 years was an unreasonable suspension of immigration and consequently a breach of the treaty. The features relating to registration he also claimed served no good purpose. Subsequently a modified bill was passed by Congress, and, although containing some of the provisions objectionable to the President, he approved it on May 6, 1882. This law provided that all immigration of Chinese laborers, skilled or unskilled, should be suspended for a period of 10 years.

Conditions in California and on the Pacific coast arising from Chinese immigration had been bad before the making of the Burlingame treaty of 1868, by which the United States bound itself to recognize the inalienable right of such people to migrate and establish permanent homes in America. So aptly did the treaty-making power deal with the problem in that instance. Conditions in California and on the Pacific coast were then and soon afterwards so bad that, in 1872, California was pleading with Congress for the exclusion of the Chinese; that is, for the termination of the "inalienable right" of Chinese to come to America in tens, or even hundreds, of millions. A congressional committee was sent to California, where it found conditions very bad.

After the making of the second immigration treaty with China in 1880-81 it was soon found that that immigration treaty was unwise and the United States asked China to agree to its abrogation; but China objected and delayed, until Congress passed a drastic exclusion law, from which the President withheld his approval until he became convinced that China would not enter into a new treaty abrogating the treaty of 1880, of which the United States was by then anxious to be rid. That was the second successive failure of the treaty-making power of our Government to handle Chinese immigration in a manner which our own people would tolerate.

Another and controlling objection to the regulation of our immigration by treaties is that it would give to foreign powers a voice in that policy, whereas under the present system it is treated as a domestic question to be regulated by Congress in the constitutional way according to our own will. Even the opponents of restriction should not favor the adoption of a policy by which we would surrender our right to deal with the subject in our own way. That right once lost would be hard to regain. The permanent loss of it would be an irreparable calamity to America. As already shown, foreign countries, under the promptings of self-interest, must consent to the provisions of treaties. Under that system our immigration policy would be shaped not by the representatives of our people but partly by our treaty-making power and partly by foreign countries. If that policy should ever be generally and permanently adopted, it would entail consequences too tragic to be stated here.

The regulation of our immigration by agreements made by our Executive with foreign countries, without the approval of Congress, or without the consent and approval of the Senate, is a still greater and more dangerous departure from the American policy of treating this as a purely domestic question.

President Roosevelt's agreement with Japan, made in 1908, commonly called "the gentlemen's agreement," has now been recognized by both countries for some 15 years. Both Japan and the United States have insisted that they were living up to its terms.

The use of the word "agreements" in the immigration acts of 1920 and 1922, both passed by the two Houses of Congress and approved by the President, was a conscious and deliberate recognition of the agreement made by President Roosevelt with Japan, regulating immigration from that country to the United States. Yet that agreement was made by the President regardless of the wishes of Congress and without the consent of the Senate. It was never submitted to the Senate for ratification.

That agreement was held up to the Legislature of the State of California as a valid treaty prevailing over the will and power of that State legislative body. In a letter which President Roosevelt wrote to Speaker Stanley, of the lower house of the California Legislature, under date of February 8, 1909, protesting against certain anti-Japanese legislation then pending in that legislature, among other things, President Roosevelt said:

But such a bill as this school bill accomplishes literally nothing whatever in the line of the object aimed at and gives just cause for irritation, while, in addition, the United States Government would be obliged immediately to take action in the Federal courts to test such legislation, as we hold it to be clearly a violation of the treaty (Theodore Roosevelt—An Autobiography, pp. 416–417).

Thus President Roosevelt called this agreement, made without submission to the Senate, a "treaty" and threatened the Legislature of California with its prevailing power as a treaty, to which the Legislature of California submitted.

In my judgment that agreement has always been without legal or binding force. However, at least two Presidents have recognized it as valid, and one of them has called it a treaty. Congress has twice recognized it, and a sovereign State has submitted to it as the supreme law of the land. In addition, it has been in operation between two great countries for some 15 years, during which it has regulated the immigration from Japan to the United States. Manifestly, then, it is possible that the President might, without consulting Congress or even the Senate, inaugurate a system of immigration regulation according to his own will. Because that has been done in a very vital immigration connection and a precedent thereby set, it is more apt to be done again. Under such a system neither Congress nor the Senate would have any voice in immigration regulation. It is now being urged that the Congress is bound by it.

A member of this committee, in his study of this question, referred to several able gentlemen the brief or statement on certain phases of this problem which the writer prepared for the use of the committee. Among the gentlemen to whom this statement was referred is Hon. George W. Wickersham, formerly Attorney General of the United States, who acts as president of the National Committee on American-Japanese Relations, which has conducted an active propaganda against the pending legislation. From Mr. Wickersham's reply I quote the following:

The matter should be dealt with, it seems to me, by negotiation with these foreign countries. The agreement which might be reached through negotiation would not necessarily be a treaty but the sort of agreement which customarily is made by the executive branch of our Government, as, for example, the international postal conventions. There is quite a range of international agreements, not rising to the dignity of a treaty, respecting which throughout our history the executive government has acted without reference to the treaty-making power.

The suggestion in this connection concerning agreements which "do not rise to the dignity of" treaties probably refers to the "gentlemen's agreement" regulating immigration from Japan, made by Mr. Roosevelt, and others like it regulating the same subject which might be made by other Presidents. Not "rising to the dignity of" treaties, these "agreements" would not have to be submitted to the Senate. The "gentlemen's agreement" was not. Such agreements, if made and accepted as valid regulations of immigration and then successfully held up as bars to congressional action, would oust Congress of all control over our domestic policy concerning a problem of greatest importance. If such "agreements," not subject to the approval of the Senate, are to be permitted to control our immigration policies. President Hayes, who made the Burlingame treaty, which guaranteed the Chinese "the inalienable right" to migrate to America, could have merely made an agreement "not rising to the dignity of" a treaty and accomplished what he then contended for. President Arthur could have likewise worked his will in avoiding a later act in restraint of Chinese immigration to America by such an agreement much better than by a veto, as he undertook to do. Presidents Cleveland, Taft, and Wilson needed only to have made such agreements and to have Congress and the American people accept them as inviolable international obligations too sacred to be touched by congressional action. Mr. Wickersham's suggestion as to "agreements not rising to the dignity of" treaties regulating immigration to the United States is very unfortunate, unless it proves fortunate as a reminder that the handling of immigration by agreement not submitted to the Senate might be resorted to again and again until it became an established policy, and Congress thereby ousted from control over the question, leaving it wholly to those who have almost, though not quite, uniformly tried to restrain the Congress elected by the people from doing the will of the Nation in protecting it, even so far as it has been protected. Control of immigration by treaties would be dangerous. Control of it by agreements between the Executive and foreign countries "not rising to the dignity of" treaties would be even more dangerous.

In the deliberate judgment of the writer, formed after full consideration of all the objections which the opponents of this legislation have urged, an opportune time has arrived for the American Congress to say with emphasis that it proposes to retain and exercise, in the protection of American interests and in obedience to the Constitution, full control over this vitally important question without consulting any foreign potentate or power.

Neither Italy, Japan, nor any other nation has any right to ask, much less to insist, that we change our method of handling this fundamentally domestic question in our own way and place ourselves where we would have to procure their consent to our regulatory, restrictive, or prohibitory immigration measures.

There has been an apparent effort to impress the country with the idea that the only question between Congress and the Executive concerning the Japanese exclusion provisions of the recent immigration act was whether the act should go into effect July 1, 1924, March 1, 1925, or at some subsequent date. Many people who thought they were keeping informed on this issue were lead to believe that the whole controversy was over this question. That was not the question at all.

The controversy was over the question whether the Congress of the United States should control immigration as required by the Constitution of the United States, or would shirk its responsibility fixed by the Constitution and let another department usurp it in violation of the purpose of the Constitution in violence to important present public interests and the equally important interests of the future. I have explained in the foregoing remarks what was involved in the proposed continuance of the present unratified and only partially published and partially known Executive agreement with Japan, called the "gentlemen's agreement," never submitted to the Senate for approval.

In order that those who wish to know may understand how this matter assumed its final status I call attention to the fact that while the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization was shaping this legislation in committee the executive department sent to the House committee an amendment to be inserted in the bill in the following language as an exception to section 3, "an alien entitled to enter the United States under the provisions of a treaty," in such connection as would have exempted from the excluding provision of the entire law the nationals of every country with which the United States should have a treaty regulating immigration made before or after the passage of the law. By inserting such a provision in the bill as the Executive, through its State Department, sought to have inserted, Congress would have placed itself in the attitude of seeking to renounce its constitutional duty to regulate immigration from any country except such as the President might leave within the operation of the law by his failure to control it by treaty. Of course, Congress can not legally, or without gross dereliction, throw down responsibilities which the Constitution places upon it, and the executive department can not, without blameworthiness, seek to take upon itself the performance of functions which the Constitution places upon Congress. Both of these vices were involved in the suggestion made to the committee by the Executive, through the State Department. Moreover, in view of the history of the country's dealing with this vitally important question the suggestion was fraught with grave danger in addition to the violence it offered to the Constitution.

When this first suggestion, that virtually all regulation of immigration be passed to the treaty-making power, was unanimously rejected by the committee and not tolerated by the House, another amendment was sent to the conferees in the following language, to be inserted in section 12 (c) of the present bill:

> • • • after the letter (b) and before the word "no" insert "on and after March 1, 1926."
> On same page at the end of the paragraph strike out the period, insert a colon and insert "Provided, however, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to the nationals of those countries with which the United States, after the enactment of this act, shall have entered into treaties, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the restriction of immigration."

By this the Executive showed that, not being permitted to control immigration with all countries by treaty, it sought to control our immigration from Asiatic and Malayan countries by treaties. This was not quite as vicious as the usurpation involved in undertaking to control it by unratified and partly secret Executive agreements, but it was nevertheless vicious and dangerous in that it involved the same principle embodied in the amendment first suggested by the executive department, except that it was limited to the clause excluding immigrants from Asiatic countries. One would be stupid indeed who could not see that after that principle and precedent were established and made to control immigration from Asiatic countries it would probably be extended to all countries. The House and Senate conferees, though evidently anxious to oblige the President, were unable to bring themselves to the acceptance of that principle.

But the Executive did not stop there. The same suggestion was obscured and sugar-coated and wrapped up in the following language, which the conferees were finally induced to accept and embody in their conference report:

> Provided, That this subdivision shall not take effect as to exclusion until March 1, 1925, before which time the President is requested to negotiate with the Japanese Government in relation to the abrogation of the present arrangement on this subject.

This language was so shaped that it could be distorted into three meanings, though it had but one and was intended to have but one. First, it was possible, not reasonable, for an interested political press to hold it forth as meaning only that the President desired eight additional months within which to persuade and flatter Japan into conceding graciously the right of the United States to control this domestic question in its own way, only postponing the date when the law would become effective. But it did not mean that and was not so intended. The second meaning, which, like the first, might be held forth until the general election had passed, was that this additional time should be granted; and in the meantime the President was requested to busy himself in getting rid of the "gentlemen's agreement," with the consent and approval of Japan. This version carried the idea that the gentlemen's agreement would in any event be ended and the statute now being enacted would in any event become the law on March 1, 1925; but according to this view, as stated by Chairman JOHNSON, who had been seduced into accepting it, it was meant merely to "throw a kiss at Japan," while we went ahead enacting our law in our own way, to become effective unconditionally on March 1, 1925, after we had gone through the pretense of securing Japan's consent to what, according to that view, we were determined to do regardless of her giving or withholding her consent.

But the clause did not mean that and was not intended to operate that way, though the country was to be induced to so construe it for the present. It meant something or nothing. If it meant nothing, it involved only palaver and unworthy hypocrisy on our part for the purpose of deceiving the country or temporarily deceiving and for the moment placating Japan. We must not accept the suggestion that the State Department or the President intended that. Then, thirdly, if it meant anything worthy of consideration at all, it meant to request the President to solicit Japan to agree with him on some method by which the Executive or treaty-making power and the foreign country, which is entitled to no voice in the matter, should control the question regardless of the wishes and interests of the American people as expressed in Congress. It is gratifying indeed to note that neither branch of Congress would tolerate this last suggestion any more than they would favorably consider the clause as meaning mere hypocritical palaver or "throwing a kiss at Japan." Therefore, the third effort of the Executive met the disapproval which the first two had met, and for the same good reasons.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1924

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9192, making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate be confined to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and 15 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of an urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 30 minutes, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know whether I will have a chance to get into that or not. Otherwise I object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. About long enough to ask a question—about five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think there will be any question about that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois give way for a moment so that the Chair may lay before the House a message from the President of the United States?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION—VETO MESSAGE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

Herewith is returned, without approval, H. R. 7959, a bill "to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes."

The bill provides a bonus for the veterans of the World War and dependents of those who fell. To certain of its beneficiaries, whose maximum benefits do not exceed $50, this bonus is to be paid immediately in cash. To each of its beneficiaries who are not to receive such immediate cash payment there is to be provided free insurance under a 20-year endowment plan. The face value of each policy will be based upon the military service, the average amount being at least $962, payable at the expiration of 20 years or at death prior thereto. After the lapse of two years the holder of a policy may borrow thereon from banks at reasonable rates of interest. If amounts so borrowed are not repaid by the veteran, the Government is obligated to pay to the banks this indebtedness, which ultimately reduces the maturity value of the policy.

An appropriation of $146,000,000 for the fiscal year 1925 will be required to provide the prorated annual cost of the insurance and to meet cash payments to those not receiving such insurance. This does not include administrative costs, which will amount to approximately $6,500,000 the first year. For the fiscal year 1926 an appropriation of $155,500,000 will be required, and the annual appropriations for the 20-year period will aggregate, according to the lowest estimate, $2,280,758,542. These and the other figures herein are from the Veterans' Bureau, but the Treasury estimates are materially more.

That part of the annual appropriation not required to meet the cash bonus or to pay policies maturing on account of death will be invested in Government bonds. The face value of the bonds thus acquired plus the interest thereon reinvested will equal during the 20-year period the maturity value of the insurance policies, aggregating at the lowest estimate $3,145,000,000.

The money spent for the acquisition of these bonds manifestly can not be spent for any other purpose, no matter how urgent our other requirements may be. In other words, we will be committing this Nation for a period of 20 years to an additional average annual appropriation of $114,000,000. This of itself should require most serious reflection, but if we are to have such commitment it should be in some form which would be in harmony with recognized principles of Government finance. The provisions of this bill are not so in harmony. Under it the Government will not have in the fund in 1945 two and a half billions of dollars. All it will have will be its own obligations, and it will owe two and a half billions of dollars cash. It will then be necessary to sell to the public this two and a half billions of bonds—a major operation in finance which may be disastrous at that time and may jeopardize the value of Federal securities then outstanding.

We have no money to bestow upon a class of people that is not taken from the whole people. Our first concern must be the Nation as a whole. This outweighs in its importance the consideration of a class, and the latter must yield to the former. The one compelling desire and demand of the people to-day, irrespective of party or class, is for tax relief. The people have labored during the last six years under a heavy tax burden. This was necessary to meet the extraordinary costs of the war. This heavy assessment has been met willingly and without complaint. We have now reached a financial condition which permits us to lighten this tax burden. If this bill becomes law, we wipe out at once almost all the progress five hard years have accomplished in reducing the national debt. If we now confer upon a class a gratuity such as is contemplated by this bill, we diminish to the extent of the expenditures involved the benefits of reduced taxes which will flow not only to this class but to the entire people. When it is considered that less than $40 a year would pay for the average policy provided by this bill, there is strong ground to assume that the veterans themselves would be better off to make that small payment and be relieved of the attendant high taxes and high living costs which such legislation would impose on them. Certainly the country would. We have hardly an economic ill to-day which can not be attributed directly or indirectly to high taxes.

The prosperity of the Nation, which is the prosperity of the people, rests primarily on reducing the existing tax burden. No other action would so encourage business. No other legislative enactment would do so much to relieve agriculture. The drastic executive campaign for economy in Government expenditures has but one purpose—that its benefits may accrue to the whole people in the form of reduction in taxes. I can not recede from this purpose. I am for the interests of the whole people. The expenditures proposed in this bill are against the interests of the whole people. I do not believe they are for the benefit of the veterans.

The running expenses of the Government for services and supplies must be met. Certain other obligations in the nature of investments for improvements and buildings are necessary and often result in a saving. The debts of the Nation must be paid. The sum of all these is a tremendous amount. At the present rate it is nearly $35 for each resident of our country, or $175 for each average family every year, and must be for some time. This bill calls for a further expenditure in the aggregate of nearly $35 for each inhabitant and lays nearly $175 more on each family, to be spread over a period of 20 years. No one supposes the effort will stop here. Already suggestions are made for a cash bonus in addition, to be paid at once. Such action logically would be encouraged if this bill becomes law. Neither the rich nor the profiteers will meet this expense. All of this enormous sum has to be earned by the people of this country through their toil. It is taken from the returns of their production. They must earn it; they must pay it. The people of this country ought not to be required by their Government to bear any such additional burden. They are not deserving of any such treatment. Our business is not to impose upon them but to protect them.

If this bill be considered as insurance, the opportunity for such a provision has already been provided. Nearly $3,000,000,000 of war risk and Government life insurance is now outstanding, and over $500,000,000 has been paid on such policies. When this provision was made in 1917 it was on the explicit understanding of the Congress that such insurance was to relieve the Government of subsequent contributions. The then Secretary of the Treasury said in relation to the proposed insurance act: "It ought to check any further attempts at service pension legislation by enabling a man now to provide against impairment through old age, total disability, or death resulting from other causes, and to give all this protection to those kindred who may be dependent upon him and who do not share in the Government compensation." This opportunity was afforded all those who entered the service. It was distinctly understood that it covered every obligation on the part of the Government. The intent of this bill now to provide free insurance lacks both a legal or moral requirement and falls into the position of a plain gratuity.

Considering this bill from the standpoint of its intrinsic merit, I see no justification for its enactment into law. We owe no bonus to able-bodied veterans of the World War. The first duty of every citizen is to the Nation. The veterans of the World War performed this first duty. To confer upon them a cash consideration or its equivalent for performing this first duty is unjustified. It is not justified when considered in the interests of the whole people; it is not justified when considered alone on its own merits. The gratitude of the Nation to these veterans can not be expressed in dollars and cents. No way exists by which we can either equalize the burdens or give adequate financial reward to those who served the Nation in both civil and military capacities in time of war. The respect and honor of their country will rightfully be theirs forever more. But patriotism can neither be bought nor sold. It is not hire and salary. It is not material, but spiritual. It is one of the finest and highest of human virtues. To attempt to pay money for it is to offer it an unworthy indignity which cheapens, debases, and destroys it. Those who would really honor patriotism should strive to match it with an equal courage, with an equal fidelity to the welfare of their country, and an equal faith in the cause of righteousness.

I am not unmindful that this bill also embraces within its provisions the disabled of our veterans and the dependents of those who fell. To state that the disabled veterans and these dependents are entitled to this additional gratuity is to state that the Nation is not meeting its obligation to them. Such a statement can not truthfully be made. The Nation has spent more than $2,000,000,000 in behalf of disabled veterans and dependents of those who died. It is now spending for compensation, training, insurance, and hospitalization more than $400,000,000 annually. Solicitude for the disabled veterans and the dependents of those who lost their lives is the Nation's solicitude. To minister to their every need is a sacred obligation, which will be generously and gratefully met. The Nation stands ready to expend any amount needed for their proper care. But that is not the object of this bill.

America entered the World War with a higher purpose than to secure material gain. Not greed but duty was the impelling motive. Our veterans as a whole responded to that motive. They are not asking as a whole, they do not want as a whole, any money recompense. Those who do seek a money recompense for the most part, of course, prefer an immediate cash payment. We must either abandon our theory of patriotism or abandon this bill. Patriotism which is bought and paid for is not patriotism. Our country has maintained the principle that our Government is established for something higher and finer than to permit those who are charged with the responsibility of office, or any class whose favor they might seek, to get what they can out of it. Service to our country in time of war means sacrifice. It is for that reason alone that we honor and revere it. To attempt to make a money payment out of the earnings of the people to those who are physically well and financially able is to abandon one of our most cherished American ideals. The property of the people belongs to the people. To take it from them by taxation can not be justified except by urgent public necessity. Unless this principle be recognized our country is no longer secure, our people no longer free. This bill would condemn those who are weak to turn over a part of their earnings to those who are strong. Our country can not afford it. The veterans as a whole do not want it. All our American principles are opposed to it. There is no moral justification for it.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 15, 1924.

The SPEAKER. The message is ordered printed. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, of course every Member of the House will want an opportunity to vote on this most important matter, and in making the request I am about to make I am mindful of requests that have been made to me by gentlemen who are unable to be here before the last part of next week. I shall not press this, if there be any real objection to it. I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal on Thursday next this question be taken up and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it is perfectly fair to request that there should be a postponement for a few days so that everyone might have an opportunity to vote on this important measure, but I do not think it is fair or wise to postpone the consideration of the bill beyond next Tuesday. Therefore, I ask the majority leader if he will agree to Tuesday?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agreed with certain gentlemen that I would make the request. Of course I shall not press it if there be objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that action upon the President's veto message be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal on Thursday next. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not clearly understand the majority leader when he gave his reasons for desiring the delay and I will thank him if he will make them plainer to me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply stated that a number of gentlemen had informed me that it would be impossible for them to be here before next Thursday. I said to them that I would attempt to accommodate them by asking unanimous consent that this matter be taken up next Thursday. I further stated that I should not press that matter if there was real objection to it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. But I have not finished yet.

Mr. RANKIN. I thought the gentleman had finished his question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that the gentleman from Nebraska had asked his question, and that it had been answered. If he has not, then the Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to put the question.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] if Members will have any opportunity to speak on this proposition in the House? I will give my reason for that question: In the first place the bill was brought in here under a suspension of the rules, shutting off all amendments and practically all debate. Then the President comes out here to-day with a great long document which, to be perfectly frank, goes out of its way to offer a gratuitous insult to the ex-service men who have been demanding this adjusted compensation. [Applause.] He virtually denounces them as unpartiotic.

Unless we have an opportunity to speak for the ex-soldiers while the press carries the President's message representing the views of the predatory interests who continue to fight this measure in an insidious and unfair manner I shall object. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Then, Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the matter be disposed of.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I object. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, this matter be taken up and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Mississippi to object to that request also?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if we object to any extension of time, when will this proposition come to a vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a motion would be in order to fix a date.

Mr. WATKINS. Would a motion be in order to consider the matter now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. WATKINS. Then I move to consider it at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that on Monday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, this matter shall be disposed of. On that motion I move the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that, that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is not in order. The only motion that would be in order would be a motion to refer it to a committee, and that has not been made.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas. Has the gentleman any authority?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; there was such a motion made to refer it in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. But what authority?

Mr. BLANTON. To postpone it to a day certain can be done only by unanimous consent, and I cite the Chair to the precedents for the last 10 years.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman the authority there?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not got it in my hip pocket.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that while a point of order is pending.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to offer an amendment to the motion.

Mr. BLANTON. You can not do that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the Chair rules, I desire to modify my motion by substituting Saturday for Monday.

Mr. BLANTON. I renew my point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Next Saturday, day after to-morrow——

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order it is not in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And upon that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] desires to be heard.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the admissibility of the motion to postpone consideration of a veto message received from the President is well established. The motion to postpone indefinitely is not admitted, but the motion to postpone to a day certain is in order and has been offered under similar circumstances at least once in every recent Congress.

If the Speaker desires citations to that effect they may be found in Volume IV of Hinds' Precedents, sections 3542 to 3547. In fact, this question was decided by the present occupant of the chair on August 18, 1919, when the gentleman from Texas, who raises the point of order, made the same point of order against this same motion under identical circumstances.

The SPEAKER. Yes; and also in September, 1919.

Mr. CANNON. That is true; and again in the Sixty-sixth Congress, when the veto of the Volstead bill was received.

The House has just listened to a presentation of one side of this question and is entitled to hear the other side. The advocates of this bill are entitled to their day in court.

The SPEAKER. There is a precedent of September 19, 1922, when Mr. Mondell moved the further consideration of the President's message be had to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RANKIN. But there there was no point of order against that——

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the Chair will find that in the case referred to, the Mondell case, there was no point of order made. This proposition is not governed altogether by the rules of the House, but it is governed largely by the Constitution, and my understanding—I have not the Constitution at my hand here and unfortunately the copy has been removed from the desk——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read.

If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it.

Mr. RANKIN. Now, if the Chair pleases, that means to proceed immediately to its consideration, as I understand it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had been here long enough he would not make that statement.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I realize I am on the opposite side of this controversy from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], but I insist that the gentleman from Ohio has no right to interrupt me without my permission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is correct.

Mr. RANKIN. Now, suppose the Chair should hold that the gentleman from Ohio, or anyone else, should have the right to postpone this matter from day to day or from week to week and could carry it over 30 days or six months or beyond the adjournment of this Congress, because all we need to adjourn the Congress to-morrow is a concurrent resolution of both Houses. I submit, Mr. Speaker, the very letter and spirit of the Constitution provides that when a bill having the President's veto is returned to the House we should proceed immediately to its consideration, and that the gentleman's motion is entirely out of order.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman——

Mr. RANKIN. Further, Mr. Speaker, it has been the practice ever since the beginning of the Government when veto messages were brought to the House to proceed immediately to their consideration, unless unanimous consent was given to carry them over until a day certain.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if there is any better speech to be made or an argument on this bill than instant action by this House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BEGG. I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi in reference to his parliamentary argument, and the question I want to ask the gentleman is, Does the gentleman contend in his argument that if we had a concurrent resolution adjourning this House at 3.30, we could not act upon it, even though there was a veto message pending?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, that question is all out of order——

Mr. BEGG. That is all the gentleman's argument.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman evidently did not hear what I said.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is propounding a question as to procedure which ought to be settled.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York wishes to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do, too.

Mr. CLEARY. I do, too.

Mr. FISH. Will it be in order to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to bring this matter to a vote immediately?

The SPEAKER. Why, certainly——

Mr. FISH. I wish to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not ordered. Is any further debate desired?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] to the fact that what he asks for is often impossible. The Senate in such a case as this has to act first, so that in a great many cases it has been absolutely impossible for the House to act immediately after the receipt of a veto message, so that that can not be the meaning of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] moved to consider the President's veto on a day certain, whereupon the point of order was made that such a motion was not in order.

Now, then, I respectfully submit to the Speaker that the same situation arose at the time that the presidential veto was delivered to this House on the so-called Volstead Act, and the House was in a similar tangle as to the parliamentary situation and as to the propriety of the motion to fix a day certain. Whereupon the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Volstead, or the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Walsh, withdrew his motion, and the House proceeded to vote on the question then and there. [Applause.]

Now, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], it is first in order to consider a vote on the message at this time, but as I understand the situation the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] wants time to get his breath after listening to such a message.

But to get back to the point of order. If the motion now pending is in order, then it is possible for a majority to keep the House from considering a veto at any time. I submit that we should follow the precedent established at the time the Volstead Act was sent back to the House and we should proceed to a vote immediately.

The SPEAKER: The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY].

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I was going to tell the story that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] related. But it was this way: Mr. Volstead got up and asked permission to put this off to Wednesday, and it was granted by Speaker Clark. Two hours after that the prohibition men got around Volstead and said "Vote now," and then Volstead got up and asked permission of the Speaker to get up the question now. That was two hours after it was put on. That is what happened then.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to propound an interrogatory to the Speaker: If it is in order to postpone to a day certain, and that motion is voted down, would not, under the Constitution, the vote then revert to an immediate consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so if there is no other privileged motion.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. So that if those who want consideration voted down the motion to postpone, it would result in immediate consideration automatically?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is entirely immaterial to me, of course, whether the vote is taken immediately or later, and it is for the House to determine. But in good faith to colleagues on this side of the Chamber, some of whom are absent, I think this statement should be made.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that I made the request largely influenced by the request made to me by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD], the whip on that side of the House, that opportunity be given to gentlemen to be present and he suggested three days' notice. That is one of the reasons why I asked postponement.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was about to state that the gentleman from Ohio advised me several days ago—I do not recall that I made any request concerning it—but I asked him as to the procedure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] made the request.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And the gentleman advised me that there would be three days' notice, and I so advised gentlemen on this side; I advised them to that effect.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will also say that a number of gentlemen on that side spoke to me about postponing action, so that their colleagues could be advised.

Mr. FISH rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. FISH. I desire to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. No motion would now be in order. The Chair thinks that the question of order is very clear.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to call the Speaker's attention to what happened in the Sixty-sixth Congress when the Volstead Act was passed.

The SPEAKER. That has been cited twice.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but the Speaker will not find a single instance where a point of order has been made to a motion to postpone to a day certain and it has been overruled.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman cite a case?

Mr. BLANTON. There was a similar request made to postpone to a day certain on the Volstead Act.

The SPEAKER. That was not a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BLANTON. I know. But it was stated then that an agreement had been made with New York Members to the effect that the vote would not be taken at that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, would any further argument be in order?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the Chair desire any further argument as to the legitimacy of this motion?.

The SPEAKER. The situation seems clear to the Chair. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has made a motion to postpone to a day certain action on the President's veto. Now, the Constitution, as the Chair has already read, provides that "the House shall proceed to consider it." If that meant that the House should proceed immediately to vote upon it, then the action of the House for a great many years has been entirely wrong, because the House has repeatedly entertained and voted on motions to refer it to a committee and to postpone. It seems to the Chair that the language "the House shall proceed to consider it" means that the House shall immediately proceed to consider it under the rules of the House, and that the ordinary motions under the rules of the House—to refer, to commit, or to postpone to a day certain—are in order. One gentleman suggested that such a construction put it in the hands of one gentleman to determine what the House shall do; but, on the contrary, it leaves it entirely in the hands of the House. If the House does not like the motion that is made, it can vote it down and the House can have its will. It seems to the Chair that is an exact compliance with the Constitution and is also the action which allows the House entire freedom of action. So the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman's motion is voted down, does that bring up the matter automatically?

The SPEAKER. If no other motion which is in order is made, then it would come immediately to a vote.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that at present. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has made a motion that it be postponed until Saturday, and on that he moved the previous question. Of course, the House has to act first upon that. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio for the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONGWORTH) there were—yeas 128, noes 54.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that action on the veto be postponed until immediately after the reading of the Journal on Saturday next.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that request.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONGWORTH) there were—ayes 109, noes 112.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 179, nays 171, not voting 83, as follows:

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I can qualify or not. I came in the door here, but I could not hear whether my name was called or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must take upon himself the responsibility of saying whether or not he was present when his name was called.

Mr. BACHARACH. I would not want to say because there was so much confusion.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recorded as present. I was not here when my name was called but would have voted "aye" if I had been present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could not do that.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a recapitulation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the vote is close enough for that—8 votes.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9192) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 9192, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska objects. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, namely:

SENATE

CONTINGENT EXPENSES

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation of stenographers to committees at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, $100,000.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

INTER-AMERICAN COMMITTEE ON ELECTRICAL COMMUNICATIONS

To defray the cost of representation of the United States at the meeting of the Inter-American Committee on Electrical Communications to be held in Mexico City, Mexico, in 1924, as authorized by the joint resolution approved April 28, 1924, including payment of salaries of a secretary and other employees, travel and subsistence expenses (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), and such other expenses as the President may deem necessary to the accomplishment of the purposes expressed in the aforesaid resolution, to be disbursed under the direction and subject to the approval of the Secretary of State, $30,000, to remain available during the fiscal year 1925.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

MISCELLANEOUS OBJECTS

Investigation and prosecution of war frauds: For the investigation and prosecution of alleged frauds, either civil or criminal, or other crimes or offenses against the United States, growing out of or arising in connection with the preparation for or prosecution of the late war, including the institution and prosecution of suits for the recovery of moneys which contain no element of fraud but arose incident to the investigation of alleged frauds, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and the judiciary for the fiscal year 1924, $200,000, to remain available until June 30, 1925.

UNITED STATES COURTS

Salaries, fees, and expenses, United States marshals: For salaries, fees, and expenses of United States marshals and their deputies, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and the judiciary for the fiscal year 1924, $530,000.

Salaries and expenses of United States district attorneys: For salaries and expenses of United States district attorneys, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and the judiciary for the fiscal year 1924, $210,000.

Salaries and expenses of clerks, United States courts: For salaries of clerks of United States circuit courts of appeals and of United States district courts, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Departments of State and justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year 1924, $35,000.

Fees of United States commissioners: For fees of United States commissioners and justices of the peace acting under section 1014, Revised Statutes of the United States, $125,000.

Fees of jurors: For fees of jurors, $250,000.

Fees of witnesses: For fees of witnesses and for payment of the actual expenses of witnesses, as provided by section 850, Revised Statutes of the United States, $200,000.

Miscellaneous expenses, United States courts: For such miscellaneous expenses as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, for the United States courts and their officers, including so much as may be necessary in the discretion of the Attorney General for such expenses in the District of Alaska and in courts other than Federal courts, $35,000.

PENAL INSTITUTIONS

Support of United States prisoners: For support of United States prisoners, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and the judiciary for the fiscal year 1924, $602,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill is to provide urgently needed funds for the immediate needs mainly of the courts of the country. The total amount carried in the bill is $2,317,000.

One hundred thousand dollars of the total is requested by the Senate to pay the expenses of the committees which it has appointed and which have been at work investigating. The Senate has had during this session $225,000 so far for the purpose indicated. It has already spent $214,000 of the $225,000. This left $11,000 on hand unexpended at the time the testimony was taken in connection with this bill. It is, of course, impossible for the House to tell just why all the money is required by the Senate for the purpose indicated, but I assume the Senate itself should be given a rather free hand to decide questions in which it alone is involved. It may be that we do not approve of all the expenditures made by the Senate or the purposes for which they are made, but nevertheless the Senate is a responsible part of Congress. It has independent functions to perform, and it has a right, I think, beyond any question to say whether or not it shall perform them and how much it shall cost. It is true that the money can not be expended by the Senate without confirmation of the House, but there ought to be a spirit of comity between the House and the Senate which will enable the membership of each House on matters pertaining to that House to decide in a large degree what activities it shall engage in and how the money may be expended that is placed within its jurisdiction.

The next item in this bill is for $30,000 and is provided for the purpose of paying the expenses of three delegates, some interpreters, some stenographers, and some expert electrical men to the City of Mexico, where there is to be held on the 27th of May, and continuing from that date for three months, a convention in connection with the development of electrical communication—wireless, telegraphy, and cable.

When the Versailles treaty was under consideration it was agreed by all the parties to the treaty that sometime in the future there would be held an international—I may say a world—convention in respect of what should be done to regulate electrical communication between the nations of the world. Later on a conference was held by the European nations and the United States here in Washington relative to the subject in connection with which this world convention was to be held later. No agreement was reached as to policy; but it is of the most—I was going to say vital, but I will not—it is of the utmost importance that some world agreement shall be had in connection with the use of wave lengths in radio, in wireless telegraphy, in cable matters, in telegraphy matters, and about a year ago there was a convention held in Santiago, Chile, at which several delegates from the United States were present. This convention agreed that there should be a convention held in the City of Mexico, beginning on the 27th of next May, and in conformity with the agreement entered into there Congress passed a resolution authorizing the appointment of delegates to the convention for which the appropriation in this bill is proposed.

There is very valuable, confidential information in the possession of the Committee on Appropriations in connection with this proposed appropriation, and I should be very happy to give that information to the membership of the House if they were the only ones to whom it would be given while it was being communicated by me to them; but the press is here, and there are international reasons why we should not disclose America's interest, and there are good reasons why they should not be disclosed, and we ask you to take us on faith that the appropriation of this $30,000 is of more than great importance.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say to the gentleman that the investigation made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs is exactly in line with what the gentleman has been saying, and that committee was convinced that the United States can not properly forego participation in this conference.

Mr. MADDEN. No; we can not, if we want to protect our own interests.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KING. Will there be any effort made in this convention to so organize and make arrangements that eventually control of world intercommunication may be secured by certain classes of people?

Mr. MADDEN. The law under which this appropriation was made distinctly provides that no one interested finanically in electrical communications shall represent the United States on the delegation. All of our experts are to be taken from the departments. No one will be under pay except the clerks, stenographers, and interpreters. The delegates will be men of knowledge, without financial interest in the outcome.

Mr. KING. Will there be any politics in it, any league of nations?

Mr. MADDEN. None. Further, we provide for $2,187,000 for the Department of Justice, $200,000 of which is to supplement an appropriation of $500,000 for the prosecution of the so-called war-fraud cases. Four hundred and twenty thousand dollars of the $500,000 was expended at the date of the hearings on this bill. The department had so many cases so well in hand, so far advanced, that if we failed to give them this additional sum of money we would retard the work. There has been expended by the Department of Justice for this purpose since the work began about two years ago a little over $900,000. There has been collected by the department as the result of their work $6,000,000 and over in cash. There has been supplemental work which will result in the payment of enough money right off to make the collection $8,900,000.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Has the War Department been doing similar work?

Mr. MADDEN. About as much as the Department of Justice, but not similar work. The War Department audits the claims; they do the accounting, it is purely a matter of accounting.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is the same claims.

Mr. MADDEN. The same claims; they are certified by the War Department to the Department of Justice and the work of the War Department is all accounting.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is the gentleman able to make any forecast as to how much in addition to the $200,000 will be required to complete the work?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not; because there are $69,000,000 of claims involved in the work already under way. Nobody knows what the outcome will be, but they are making good progress.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. WOODRUFF. In addition to the $69,000,000 of claims now before the department there will be many millions more.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; they are coming every day. It has been said that the work done by the War Department and the Department of Justice is duplication. Well, to some extent that is true, but only to this extent. In the first place the War Department takes the claims and accounts, enters upon a mathematical calculation of what the situation is and what claims the Government has against any person that can be submitted for trial or prosecution to the Department of Justice, and the Department of Justice handles the claims; it has perhaps some accounting work to do on the cases but only such accounting work as is necessary in the preparation of the case for the trial in court.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It looks like this: The Appropriation Committee gave them $500,000. The Department of Justice said that is not all we need, we are going to need more. We will use the $500,000 and then go to the Appropriation Committee and say the work has progressed to such a point that it will break down if you do not give us more. So they force the House to give them the additional sum. Congress has no control over the amount of money that we pay the attorneys——

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; we have. We provide that they shall not exceed $10,000, and they go from that down.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Ten thousand dollars a year?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No man can draw more than $10,000 if he does not work but three months?

Mr. MADDEN. If he only works three months he only gets his proportion of that.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And he can hire 50 or 100 as the case may be?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman says that $6,000,000 has been collected.

Mr. MADDEN. Six million one hundred and twenty-eight thousand dollars.

Mr. HARRISON. Of that $6,000,000 over $2,000,000 were collected through the War Department, through the auditors, and in no wise ought to be credited to this appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. That was in the Lincoln Motor case?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I refer to the audit and accounting office, before it got to the Department of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield me two or three minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the remaining items in the bill consist of salaries and expenses of the United States marshals and their deputies, salaries and expenses of district attorneys and their officers, salaries and expenses of the clerks of courts, fees of United States commissioners, fees of jurors, fees of witnesses, miscellaneous expenses, United States courts, and support of United States prisoners in jails and penitentiaries throughout the United States. I wish to say that the investigation by the committee discloses the fact that unless this money is appropriated at once many of the courts will have to close, and this committee did not want to assume the responsibility of refusing to report a bill of this sort if by doing so there was any chance of closing the courts.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement by Miss Ina C. Emery, who is the author of a Monument guide book which has been on sale at the Monument for many years, made before the Subcommittee on Appropriations. It was not printed in the hearings, and it presents her side of a controversy which I think ought to be presented to the public.

Mr. MADDEN. I supplied her with that copy.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on March 28 last I called the attention of the House to the fact that a statement made by Miss Ina C. Emery before the House appropriations subcommittee on the War Department bill on February 14, preceding, relating to the sale of the Washington Monument Guide Book, had not been printed in the hearings, though a statement on the same subject by Lieut. Col. C. O. Sherrill was printed in those hearings. Remarks on the subject appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 28, pages 5184 to 5185. The only reference to Miss Emery in the printed record of the hearings was on pages 1252 and 1253, wherein Colonel Sherrill made certain references to Miss Emery and her guidebook and what she had to say was dismissed with this parenthetical statement:

> Miss Emery appeared before the committee. Her statement was transcribed and left in possession of the clerk, but is not printed, as the matter to which it relates is one beyond the jurisdiction of the committee.

With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MADDEN, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who sees no reason why the statement should not be printed, I ask the consent of the House to have printed in the RECORD the statement as made before that subcommittee by Miss Emery as furnished to her by the committee by Mr. MADDEN'S direction.

The statement follows:

Mr. ANTHONY. Miss Emery, the committee would be glad to have a short statement from you with regard to the sale of the guidebook at the Washington Monument. It is understood that you formerly had the concession for the sale of your guidebook at that place and that that concession was taken away from you. The guidebook now being sold there is one sold by the welfare association.

STATEMENT OF MISS INA CAPITOLA EMERY, OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

Miss EMERY. In 1909, after my book had been sold at the Monument for a number of years, a clause was put in the bill forbidding anything to be sold at the Washington Monument.

I went to the Secretary of War at that time—I have forgotten which one it was—and he said there was not any intention whatever to displace my book, that it was an oversight in not mentioning that, and he advised me to go to Congress.

I went before the Appropriations Committee, and the sale of my book has been continued there without interruption and with the commendation of every Secretary of War since 1901—including Senator Redfield Proctor, who became Secretary of War—and including the present one. It has had the personal indorsements of President McKinley, President Roosevelt, President Taft, Vice President Sherman; and Vice President Sherman went among the Senators and interested himself in my behalf in connection with my book.

Then, in addition to the various Secretaries of War, I have had the support of Senators CURTIS, Dillingham, HARRISON, MCKELLAR, and John Sharp Williams, and of Representatives KAHN, MADDEN, RAINEY, TAYLOR, Champ Clark, GARRETT of Tennessee, BYRNS of Tennessee, Rodenberg, of Illinois, Nolan, of California, ASWELL, of Louisiana, and a host of other Members of Congress, past and present, all of whom have indorsed my book.

I want to say as to Colonel Sherrill, that the first time I ever met him was with Senator HARRISON. He met me very pleasantly then. Later, I went to see him and asked him if I might pay in advance the $75 which I pay the Government. My book costs the Government nothing, and I pay the Government $75 a year. I supervise my book and prepare it and it is no cost or trouble to the Government. In that respect it is different from the book of Colonel Sherrill. As to his book, I have absolute proof by whom it is copyrighted and by whom it is sold.

I had learned that Fred Harvey, who was living at that time, but who has since died, had tried year after year to get the influence of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds to put his manuscript in place of my book, and that year after year he had been stopped; that they could see no reason for it. I understood that he induced Colonel Sherrill to be interested in the matter, and I heard it from Mr. C. C. Glover, who is responsible for Colonel Sherrill's being a member of the Monument Association.

I then went and asked Mr. Sherrill, as I said, the second time I had ever seen him, if I might pay the $75 in advance, as I was going away for the summer. This was in May, I believe. He did not even ask me to be seated, but he met me in an entirely different way from the way in which he met me when I went with Senator HARRISON. This was his comment: "Miss Emery, I think you have had that book too long. I think I will take it away from you." I said, "Oh, no, Colonel Sherrill."

And may I read what happened?

In May, 1922, I heard of rumors at the Monument. They were saying that my book was to be displaced. I wondered how it was that the watchmen at the Monument knew so much more about it than I did.

Finally, on repeated hearing of this matter, I went to Colonel Sherrill's office, accompanied by Senator HARRISON. As a result of that interview the Senator and I both gathered that there would be no trouble. I went to Colonel Sherrill's office the second time to ask if I might pay the license fee of $75 a year in advance at that time. Colonel Sherrill was hardly courteous——

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should go into these personal matters between Colonel Sherrill and Miss Emery.

Mr. ANTHONY. Miss Emery, just confine yourself to the facts.

Miss EMERY. He told me then he could take the permit away from me and he said that I had had it too long. I said, "Colonel Sherrill, you have been in office for some time. You do not expect to be relieved from office, do you, because you have been here so long?" He said I ought to be patriotic enough to give the book away. I replied, "You are wearing the United States uniform; are you giving your services free?" That seemed to anger him, and he then told me that he would take the book away from me. This is the only reason my book is not there now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, Miss Emery——

Mr. FRED EMERY. May I interrupt a moment to say that that is the basis of this entire persecution of my sister—the conversation that she mentions?

Miss EMERY. I said, "I am a woman; you would not take it away from me. It was put there by special act of Congress." And Colonel Sherrill snapped his fingers three times and said, "I care that, that, that for Congress." I said, "Then there is nothing more I can do."

Colonel SHERRILL. I object to this testimony, Mr. Chairman, because there is absolutely no truth in it whatever.

Mr. FRED EMERY. I was present at the time, Mr. Chairman, and I heard that statement made.

Miss EMERY. He made that statement.

Mr. ANTHONY. Miss Emery, let me call your attention to the fact that the law which governs this matter was approved on March 4, 1909.

Miss EMERY. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. And that law states:

> "That hereafter no advertisement of any kind shall be displayed and no articles of any kind shall be sold in or around the Monument, except upon the written authority of the Secretary of War."

Miss EMERY. Yes, but there is a previous law.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, has the Secretary of War given his authority for the chan[illegible]?

Miss EMERY. Yes. May I explain about that?

Mr. ANTHONY. He has?

Miss EMERY. Colonel Sherrill put his initials on this letter—"C. O. S." I assure you that that all comes from Colonel Sherrill's office.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Secretary of War has ordered this change, that seems to be the final authority under the law.

Miss EMERY. May I say this: I went to Secretary Weeks with Mr. Rodenberg in 1922 (immediately after the interview with Colonel Sherrill). Secretary Weeks said, "Miss Emery, so far as I am concerned, you may have your book there for 20 years to come, if you want it. I have heard no complaint about your book or the management." And I did have it then, as usual. But last year, when Congress was not in session, on the 1st day of July, 1923, my book was stopped.

These things are all pertinent to my not having it; they are the absolute reasons why I haven't it. I have letters saying that I ought to use a slot machine. Colonel Sherrill said that, but he is not using one for his own book. Secretary Weeks said that was ridiculous, "And, so far as I am concerned," he said, "Miss Emery, I see no reason why you should not have the book for 20 years to come." And Mr. Rodenberg, if here to-day, would corroborate that statement. So it is not Secretary Weeks; it is the influence back of it, and the letters were prepared in Colonel Sherrill's office——

Mr. ANTHONY. How long a notice did you receive that the change was contemplated?

Miss EMERY. I saw Secretary Weeks about the last of May or the first of June, and he said that for 20 years I could have it, "so far as I am concerned."

On the 8th of June, 1922, I had a letter from Secretary Weeks, saying steps were under way to renew my permit under the same conditions as heretofore, and that it would not be renewed after July 1, 1923, except under certain conditions—use of a slot machine and a reduction in the price of the book. The 35 cents charged for the book was authorized by the department. When I went to see Secretary Weeks with Representative Rodenberg, the Secretary said he did not regard 35 cents as too much and he agreed that the slot machine was impractical.

On June 23, 1922, I had a letter from the Secretary of War, evidently prepared for his signature, saying the permit would not be renewed after the fiscal year 1922–23, and that it is contemplated that the Washington Monument Association, in cooperation with the Office of Public Buildings and Grounds, prepare an abstract of the official report of the Washington Monument and its dedication for issue at nominal cost or gratis to those who make the ascent of the Monument. That was the work of the man I referred to, Mr. Harvey.

Mr. ANTHONY. What do you expect this committee to do? The law gives the authority to the Secretary of War.

Miss EMERY. I beg pardon. The law was that it could not be sold except by his authority, I think, but it could be sold there. May I read Mr. MADDEN'S letter? I feel in justice to myself you must let me show you that I do not believe Secretary Weeks would contradict himself. I think, in the mass of correspondence, that that letter was simply signed by Secretary Weeks.

Before I had time to go into the slot-machine matter—in fact, I had called up a man and he was making inquiries about the slot machine—an arbitrary letter came saying that the book would not be continued.

Mr. ANTHONY. Signed by the Secretary of War?

Miss EMERY. But it was prepared in Mr. Sherrill's office. We understand, of course, that those things are signed in a mass of correspondence. The point is that it is Colonel Sherrill. He contended that I should not make anything on my book, yet he was receiving money from outside sources, supplementing his salary.

Mr. ANTHONY. Who wrote the letter there that you wanted to call attention to?

Miss EMERY. Chairman MADDEN (of the House Appropriations Committee), on July 2, 1923.

May I preface this? After I received this letter of June 23, 1922, when Secretary Weeks signed the letter, and which does not sound like him, and which I do not believe he ever composed—I know he didn't, and it comes from Colonel Sherrill's office, and in the mass it was signed. At least, that is the inference back of it. After that, in February following, Colonel Sherrill wrote to Representative BYRNES: "We will take this under consideration, and we will want to meet your wishes," etc. He also wrote a letter to Mr. KAHN along the same line, indicating that everything would be all right.

Colonel Sherrill told Mr. Lloyd, a former Member here, over the telephone, on June 29, 1923, to "tell Miss Emery not to worry and not to disturb her salesman. She will hear from me Monday." Mr. Lloyd repeated this statement to me, as I was present at that time. On July 1 my book was stopped by Colonel Sherrill's order. This is Mr. MADDEN'S letter on July 2. "Mr. Secretary"—this was to Secretary Weeks—[reads letter]:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1923.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In Statutes at Large, volume 35, page 615, will be found the following:

"That hereafter no advertisement of any kind shall be displayed and no articles of any kind, except a guidebook to the Monument, shall be sold in or around the Washington Monument."

Then, later, in Statutes at Large, volume 35, page 997, there appears the following:

"That hereafter no advertising of any kind shall be displayed and no articles of any kind shall be sold in or around the Monument, except upon the written authority of the Secretary of War."

In pursuance of this authority, Miss Emery has been selling a guidebook to the Monument, which she has prepared at her own expense. The sale of this book involves no expenditure of public money and she has paid the Government $75 per annum for the privilege. Recently you have ordered the sale of the book discontinued. It seems to me that in view of the expense incurred by Miss Emery in the preparation of the book and the satisfaction which its sale has given in all these years to the visiting public, she should be permitted to continue its sale.

I shall consider it a personal favor if you can find it consistent to withdraw the order recently issued by you and reinstate Miss Emery's right to the sale of the book at the Monument.

Very sincerely yours,

MARTIN B. MADDEN.

Mr. DICKINSON. What is your annual profit on the sale of this book at the Monument?

Miss EMERY. About a thousand dollars a year.

Mr. DICKINSON. And you have sold how many copies?

Miss EMERY. I can not tell you exactly, I could by referring to the books. I sell about 8,000 annually.

Mr. DICKINSON. What does this book cost you?

Miss EMERY. Colonel Sherrill asked me for that information.

Mr. DICKINSON. Do not involve Colonel Sherrill.

Miss EMERY. The last copies cost me 10 cents a copy, and I pay my salesmen 10 cents.

Mr. ANTHONY. Under the law the sale of this book is peculiarly an executive matter and one over which this committee, in my opinion, would have no authority. I do not see what good it is to come before this committee and prolong our hearings on a matter of this kind.

Miss EMERY. May I say this: Colonel Sherrill stated that he would take my book away. Secretary Weeks overruled him. Now, that was in 1922. In 1923 Colonel Sherrill did take the book away. There was no book to take its place then, because Mr. Harvey died. It took six weeks before they had a book there. Then, if you will remember, President Coolidge overruled the appointment that Colonel Sherrill made of Major Wearts, his assistant, to the White House. You will remember the criticism, public and private, when that same man who prepared the book that did take the place of mine, when Mr. Sherrill appointed him in the place of Major Baldinger. He prepared this new book under Colonel Sherrill and it is copyrighted by a private organization of which Colonel Sherrill is a member. It is sold at Government expense.

Mr. DICKINSON. Do you mean to imply that Colonel Sherrill is getting any money out of the sale of this book?

Miss EMERY. I know nothing about that. I am stating the facts. That book was prepared by Colonel Sherrill, and the returns are made to Colonel Sherrill's office.

Mr. DICKINSON. For what purpose?

Miss EMERY. Wait a minute.

Mr. DICKINSON. No; I do not want to wait a minute. I am asking you a question, and I want you to answer it.

Miss EMERY. I can't say for what purpose. I couldn't say.

Mr. DICKINSON. Do you know where the profit goes?

Miss EMERY. Wait a minute. No.

Mr. DICKINSON. Then you do not think the profits from the sale of that book go to the welfare association?

Miss EMERY. I do not know what the welfare association is. I can't find out much, except that it is for Government employees, and if it is, the Government is paying every salesman that is there except one man, who is not in uniform. They are all salaried by the Government.

Mr. DICKINSON. They are members of the welfare association, are they?

Miss EMERY. Why should they be salaried by the Government as watchmen and then work as book salesmen?

Mr. DICKINSON. Do you think they are neglecting their duties as watchmen?

Miss EMERY. Yes, sir; I can bring a lady here to tell you that she tripped, and the watchman paid no attention to her, but said, "Madam, have one of our beautiful books?" I can produce the witness. This is what I was going to say, that the book was prepared by Major Wearts, the assistant of Colonel Sherrill, so the editor stated to me.

Mr. ANTHONY. Miss Emery, what do you want this committee to do?

Miss EMERY. This is all I ask—and may I read you Senator Dillingham's last letter?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think it is necessary to do that, Miss Emery.

Miss EMERY. Just one second. You asked me what I wanted—that the Washington Monument Guide Book authorized by Congress in 1909 shall be continued at the Monument, and Mr. MADDEN, I know, concurs with this idea.

Mr. ANTHONY. You are asking that?

Miss EMERY. I am asking that.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would be legislation over which this committee would have no authority.

Miss EMERY. Well, I had legislation before.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, we would have no authority to insert that legislation.

Mr. DICKINSON. It would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be subject to a point of order, and would have to come through a legislative committee.

Miss EMERY. May I say this: While Colonel Sherrill was objecting to my making some money, he said: "I ought not to make a cent, because I had made enough." I turned to him and said: "You are wearing a uniform," and he had one on at that time——

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us leave that out, Miss Emery.

Miss EMERY. But may I just say this: He said that I ought not to make anything out of the 35-cent book that I prepared, produced, and sold, yet he was drawing a private income from the Congressional Country Club, and at the same time he was drawing a salary from the Government for the same working hours.

Mr. ANTHONY. We will have to discontinue the hearing now, Miss Emery, because the committee has not the time to spare to go into further details.

Miss EMERY. May I ask you people to read the statement? May I read Senator Dillingham's last letter?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not, because the committee is without power to act in the matter.

Miss EMERY. The committee is without power to act in the matter?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is without power to act in the matter, because it is an executive matter.

Miss EMERY. You mean to say that I can not come here, yet if a man is asking for an increase in salary——

Mr. ANTHONY. Wait. You should take this matter up with the Secretary of War, who under the law has absolute power to regulate it.

Miss EMERY. Will you tell me, then, where is justice to be found, if not here, when a man who is drawing a salary under the Government would deprive me of my income for spite work absolutely? He said he would take the book away, and did take it away.

Mr. ANTHONY. We will talk it over, Miss Emery, but I am afraid we have no power to act on it.

Miss EMERY. May I ask you to read the statements, and I can prove every one of them? And if you do not believe that Colonel Sherrill said—and he said it absolutely—"I care that and that and that for Congress," and my brother said he heard it. I have a witness to it; my brother was present. I wish you would let me read Senator CURTIS'S letter in reference to this matter. Will you permit me to do that?

Mr. ANTHONY. We could not put any more in the record.

Miss EMERY. Senator Dillingham, Representative KAHN, and Mr. MADDEN are all of the same opinion, that it is a grave injustice that is being done me, and each one has said that I had recourse to Congress, as I had before.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are glad to give you the opportunity to make these statements.

Mr. FRED EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you on behalf of my sister, and to thank the whole committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. All right.

Colonel SHERRILL. I would like to submit the record. I request that this matter be cut out of the record, because she has brought in absolutely extraneous matter in the nature of an attack. If you want me to, I could give you all of the record, and to show you that all of her statements are really false, because I recommended—and I have the record here to show that I recommended the continuance of her contract over that whole year.

Mr. ANTHONY. The stenographer will note that Miss Emery's statement be transcribed, the same to be left in the possession of the clerk, without being printed, as the matter appears to be one beyond the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I asked permission several times for the propounding of a question. I have propounded that question before. I introduced a resolution here some four months ago specifically requesting information as to the number of these graft-prosecuting attorneys appointed by the Attorney General, the salaries paid or agreed to be paid them, the result of their prosecutions; specifically directing that I be furnished with the name of any war grafter now in the penitentiary as a result of those war-graft prosecutions; specifically asking, further, what portion of the time of these war-graft prosecutors had been expended in promoting the candidacy of any particular candidate for President of the United States. I have been unable to get any such answer. It is true the present Attorney General is not the same Attorney General we had when those questions were first asked. Another certain resolution was introduced about that time in this House affecting the late Attorney General, and it rather frightened him, I guess; at any rate, he oozed, and he is no longer in the old place where we knew him, and nobody has given me an answer to my question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that it would be rather a little embarrassing to the administration to ask?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I dare say it would, and I make allowance for that and so, right now exercising that gentle way which is always mine, instead of propounding the question anew to this new Attorney General—of whom I think I am going to be fond—not desiring to embarrass him, I would like to propound the question directly to the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who never permits himself to be embarrassed under any circumstances. He is always a very busy man, and he is particularly busy right now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I did not hear the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. The gentleman says he did not hear me. Indeed, I thought his ears might be tingling, as mine always do when somebody is saying something pretty about me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I was engaged by these gentlemen on my right.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman that I have been trying in vain, seeking every possible source of information, to discover the name of any one war grafter who is now in the penitentiary as the result of the expenditure of these millions of dollars for war-graft prosecutions. Now, the Department of the Attorney General has declined to give me the name of that fellow who is in the penitentiary, and so now I am coming to the seat of wisdom and asking for that name.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman this, from the information I have on the subject, that most of the conspiracy cases where proof was definite and conclusive were completed before the armistice was signed, and the statute of limitations has run, and therefore the prosecutions would not lie. I think there have not been any convictions where men have been sent to the penitentiary, but a great many civil cases have been tried and a good deal of money recovered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I yield to everybody, but I want to finish my statement.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The statute of limitation was extended three years.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated that the statute of limitations has run, and that, therefore, prosecutions would not lie in conspiracy cases. Yet if the gentleman has read the newspapers of the city of Washington he will understand and know that in the courts of this city at the present time men are being criminally prosecuted for war profiteering.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. What I want to know is, has anyone been sent to the penitentiary? The statute of limitations has run, and Fall has run, and Denby has run, and Daugherty has run, and Burns has run, and now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has run away from telling me the name of one who is in the penitentiary for war grafting.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will say that it is possible that the fact that we have a new Attorney General is responsible for the present criminal prosecutions which are now going on in the courts of Washington.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Then I think we should be congratulated on the fact that we have a new Attorney General. But I retire again in darkness with reference to an answer to the question that has been so often repeated here. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation of stenographers to committees at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, $100,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the chairman of the committee have any objection to an amendment providing for a detailed statement of expenses?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course the gentleman is at perfect liberty to offer any amendment he chooses. We can not govern the Senate, however. They are not under our orders, and we would not obtain any information.

Mr. BLANTON. When we vote this $100,000 we could attach a proviso to the effect that there should be filed a detailed statement of expenditures. I follow the gentleman from Illinois on economic matters.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not press that.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will not offer it I will withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

MISCELLANEOUS OBJECTS

Investigation and prosecution of war frauds: For the investigation and prosecution of alleged frauds, either civil or criminal, or other crimes or offenses against the United States, growing out of or arising in connection with the preparation for or prosecution of the late war, including the institution and prosecution of suits for the recovery of moneys which contain no element of fraud but arose incident to the investigation of alleged frauds, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and the judiciary for the fiscal year 1924, $200,000, to remain available until June 30, 1925.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On line 21 of page 2, following the word "war," the word should be "frauds."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, of course this $200,000 for the prosecution of war fraud claims having been obligated, it is out of the question for this House to deny the appropriation. These high priced attorneys know their business thoroughly, when they come after pay. But this makes $700,000 that has been appropriated for the prosecution of war frauds in the past year, in addition to which $500,000 was appropriated through the War Department, making $1,200,000 that has been expended in the prosecution of war frauds during the last year. This is the third million dollar appropriation for this purpose. To bolster up such extravagance it has been stated that some $6,000,000 has been collected. As a matter of fact, the testimony before the subcommittee on war appropriations shows that over $2,000,000 of that $6,000,000 was collected through the War Department on a simple audit of the claims. Another $1,500,000 represents the settlement with the Lincoln Motor Co. When this appropriation was first made—about two years ago—Mr. Daugherty came before the House of Representatives in a letter and said he was about to collect $9,000,000 from the Lincoln Motor Co. He was then being criticized for not prosecuting that claim, and he informed the House in his letter that he had already brought the matter to such a situation that $9,000,000 was about in sight, but all that seems to have been done in the way of the settlement of the Lincoln Motor Co. case by this $2,000,000 appropriation has been to reduce the $9,000,000 to $1,500,000 in a settlement. That seems to be what this appropriation has brought about, a $9,000,000 claim, which Mr. Daugherty said was in sight, being reduced to $1,500,000. Investigation of other items claimed to have been collected will probably show a similar state of facts as to them.

I therefore desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that these moneys are being appropriated without any result worthy of the name.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Would the gentleman from Virginia, out of the abundance of his knowledge, after having investigated this matter, be kind enough to tell me the name of the grafter who was brought to trial through the expenditure of this money and who is now in any Federal penitentiary?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not able to throw any light on that subject.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Darkness again.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, as every Member of the House knows, I have taken a more active interest in furthering the prosecution of the war-fraud cases than has any Member of this body. On the 11th of April, two years ago, I took the floor and in an extended speech pointed out to the House the flagrant inactivity of the Department of Justice relative to these cases. I called attention to the fact that audits of certain aircraft contracts had disclosed overpayments to the contractors by the Government running into many millions of dollars. I showed that while many of these cases had been referred to the Department of Justice, nothing whatsoever had been done to return these overpayments to the Treasury and to prosecute the guilty.

We had been regaled for many months through the columns of the newspapers in interviews with the then head of the Department of Justice, Attorney General Daugherty, with what he proposed to do to these profiteers and grafters. Promises had been long and loud, but nothing had been done. Three appropriation bills carrying appropriations for the Department of Justice had been submitted to the House, and no request for funds had been made by the Attorney General for the purpose of carrying on this work.

On April 7, 1922, when the third appropriation bill of that Congress, carrying appropriations for the Department of Justice, was before the House for consideration, an amendment was offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] providing an appropriation of $500,000 for the purpose of investigating and prosecuting the war grafters. The chairman of the committee in charge of the bill in the House, Mr. Husted, stated:

Mr. Chairman, I think I can say to the gentleman from South Dakota that he is out on the estimate just the amount carried in his amendment. The Department of Justice has not asked for this item, but the Department of Justice is engaged in this work and has ample funds to carry it on at the present time. It does not need an additional dollar for this purpose.

It seems clear from this that the Department of Justice had made no demand upon Congress for money for this purpose. Events proved that no attempt had been made to prosecute these cases. It was clear, in the minds of some of us at least, that no attempt was intended to be made to properly prosecute these claims.

On numerous occasions thereafter I secured time and continued to call the attention of the House to the conditions existing in the Department of Justice.

On the 15th of May, 1922, there was presented to the House a request by the Attorney General for an appropriation for $500,000 for the purpose of instituting investigations and prosecutions of frauds developing from the audits of war contracts. At that time I said:

I believe the Congress and the people will be, and should be, rather critical as to just how this $500,000 is expended. If results are shown, we will all applaud, if not, even greater condemnation will be heaped upon the Department of Justice.

It is significant that the Attorney General, after being in office more than a year, discovered in the short space of time from April 11 to May 15 the desirability and necessity of securing necessary funds to carry on this work. Those of us who criticized him, while recognizing his past delinquencies, were willing to give him a further opportunity to do something. I, as one of the men who had criticized him severely, felt that he had grossly neglected his plain duty in regard to these cases, but notwithstanding that fact, I wanted him to have a further opportunity to do his duty. Congress very promptly appropriated $500,000 for this purpose. I think it is true that much of the information and much of the evidence that had been available in the Department of Justice had disappeared from the files of the department, and naturally it has taken much time to replace these documents. This is responsible for some of the delay in the prosecution of these cases. It has not been responsible for all the delay, however.

After securing this appropriation the Attorney General promptly organized what is known as the war frauds section of the Department of Justice and placed in charge of its activities men of unquestioned integrity. I believe much work has been done by this war frauds section within the Department of Justice. I do not believe, however, that everything has been done that should or could have been done. I have in mind particularly the Wright-Martin case. An audit of the Wright-Martin contract disclosed an overpayment of five and a quarter million dollars. That case was reported to the Department of Justice by the War Department in October of 1921 and was the first case sent to the Department of Justice by the War Department. When the case reached the Department of Justice it fell into the hands of John W. H. Crim, an Assistant Attorney General of the United States, who promptly forwarded it to the district attorney in New York for prosecution.

I much regret a statement made on the floor of the House by a Member and a very dear friend of mine, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] relative to Mr. Crim. He challenged the integrity of Mr. Crim, and I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that, to my knowledge, there has been no man connected with the Department of Justice who is more entitled to the confidence of the Congress and the country than John W. Crim. As a matter of fact, up until the time I assailed the Attorney General and the Department of Justice, the only war-fraud cases that had been sent to the courts were sent there by John W. Crim.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Surely.

Mr. BEGG. Does not the gentleman think, in order to be absolutely fair, he should state that there was an advisory committee with very great power, consisting of ex-Senator Hardwick, Judge Bigger, of Columbus, Ohio, a man by the name of Kerr, about whom I do not know anything, and I believe Senator Thomas, of Colorado, was on this committee at one time. Their authority was unlimited, as I understand it. Does not the gentleman believe that if everything was not done that could be done these three men of unimpeachable character might have discovered it?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not believe anything of the kind. If the gentleman has been listening carefully he will understand I have given full credit to those gentlemen. I am not criticizing that particular bureau because the affairs about which I am now speaking are matters which existed in the department before the attack was made upon the Department of Justice. The men of whom the gentleman speaks all became connected with this work on July 1, 1922, or thereafter, and the conditions to which I refer existed prior to that date.

I will say further to the gentleman from Ohio regarding the situation that has existed in this department since the organization of the war fraud section that, notwithstanding the unimpeachable character of the men who handle these cases and their undoubted willingness to bring each and every grafter to account, they have, in the last analysis, been more or less helpless, for the reason that they are, after all, subordinates, and as such must take their orders from superior authority. This is true especially in affairs connected with the more important cases referred to their bureau.

In the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on Thursday, May 8, 1924, the following colloquy took place between the chairman and other members of the committee and Judge Kerr, the present head of the war frauds section in the Department of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item on the list is for the investigation and prosecution of war frauds. We asked the Attorney General when he was here to state the form of the organization in charge of the so-called war-fraud cases. Of course, he was not familiar with the details of it, and we would like very much, Judge Kerr, to have you state them. First state how long the organization has been in existence and how many people are employed in it.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I was appointed myself and began my duties with this organization some time about the 1st of July, 1922. The bill which created this section, I think, passed in May, 1922, or that is my recollection. The activities of the organization itself did not begin until about July 1, 1922. As originally contemplated and organized, the Attorney General was the head of the entire organization.

The CHAIRMAN. That is to say, all of the cases were required to be presented to him for decision before action was taken?

Mr. KERR. Yes, sir; and that has been carried out through the entire organization except in minor cases where we assumed authority.

And further.

Mr. DAVIS. And finally, before any suit or action is really begun, it has to go to the Attorney General and he orders the suit?

Mr. KERR. All suits have to be ordered by the Attorney General.

So it would seem, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Ohio is in error; that the war-frauds section does not have the unlimited authority he speaks of. Undoubtedly the authority is sufficient to enable that section to secure all necessary evidence and prepare the cases for court; but when it comes to actually starting legal procedure, to taking the cases into court, then the permission of the Attorney General must be secured; and in the Wright-Martin case this seems to have been impossible.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like to add my word to what the gentleman has said about Mr. Crim. I have known him since his boyhood, and I believe he is an able and honest man and official.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I am glad to have my opinion of Mr. Crim confirmed by my friend from Virginia, whose opinion is always given great weight by the House. To follow the Wright-Martin case a little further, I will say that in December, 1922, I was assured by men high in authority in the Department of Justice that the Wright-Martin case would be sent to the courts within three weeks. The Wright-Martin case is not yet in the courts, although I have reason to believe it will be within the near future. If the sworn testimony of the auditor who recently made a trip into Ohio to examine tax-return records of Mr. Daugherty and the books of a certain bank is to be relied upon, it is found that the ex-Attorney General of the United States was the possessor of something like 2,500 shares of the Wright-Martin Co.'s stock. Whether that had anything to do with the inactivity of the Department of Justice relative to this particular case, of course, I do not know. I do know, however, that this case was ready for the courts in December, 1921, and that the Assistant Attorney General, after repeated hearings given the Wright-Martin Co., declined to postpone action. Later the case was taken out of the hands of the district attorney in New York, and a reasonable assumption is that the Attorney General directed such action.

It is to the everlasting credit of President Coolidge that he has demanded the resignation of the man who was responsible for this situation and has placed at the head of the Department of Justice a man whose ability and integrity are unquestioned, and in whom the people of the country have confidence. I have every reason to believe that the present Attorney General of the United States is going to see to it that these war-fraud cases are taken into the courts and settled. I think that is all any Member of the House or any good citizen could ask. I have an infinite confidence in our courts, and I believe that if these cases are taken before the courts they will be decied equitably, and if this is done there will be many, many millions recovered to the Treasury.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman tell us how many cases are pending, if he knows?

Mr. WOODRUFF. There are now 118 claims for the recovery of money pending in the courts. These claims aggregate $69,342,741.23. There are also 18 claims pending with receivers and trustees in bankruptcy. These aggregate $2,686,418.43. Just how much is involved in the more than 400 other cases now in the hands of the war-frauds section, and which have not as yet been presented to the courts, I can not say, but it must run into an enormous amount.

It will be interesting to the Members, also, to know what has been done by the different departments of the Government in securing the return of money to the Treasury. The following are the figures up to date:

Audit section of Air Service (collected)	$280,423.93
Department of Justice (collected)	6,189,607.24
Department of Justice (settlements not yet paid)	3,000,000.00
General Accounting Office (collected)	434,431.10
Contract audit section, War Department (collected)	4,230,128.35
Total	14,134,590.62

This amount, Mr. Chairman, is sufficient to pay the salaries of every Member of this House for four and a third years, and enough to pay the salary of a single Member for nearly 2,000 years.

Comparatively few of the war contracts have received the attention of the contract audit section and the Department of Justice. If the entire 350,000 war contracts are carefully audited and the necessary legal action taken in those which show overpayments it is reasonable to suppose that enough money can be recovered to pay the salaries of the House membership for many years to come.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] seems much interested to know the name of any man who has been sent to jail for conspiracy to defraud the Government during the war. He seems to doubt that any one of them are to receive this proper punishment for their misdeeds. Certainly his inquiries are proper ones and do credit to the gentleman propounding them. But, Mr. Chairman, he does not carry the inquiries far enough. Inasmuch as no one seems able to enlighten him, he should inquire why there has been no one convicted of conspiracy. For the information of the gentleman, I will quote a further colloquy between the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and Judge KERR reminding the gentleman that it was the neglect of the gentleman's party—which was in control of the Government during the war—to extend the statute of limitations that has made it practically impossible to secure criminal indictments in all but a few cases:

Mr. KERR. There is one thing that perhaps I ought to call attention to in connection with criminal prosecutions. It is not generally understood that the statute of limitations was three years, but you extended it to six years.

The CHAIRMAN. That means that the cases in which the statute of limitations had expired at the time we extended it were out of your jurisdiction?

Mr. KERR. Yes, sir; and most of the cases of actual fraud or cases of an indictable character occurred prior to the armistice. I speak of the armistice as a general point of division. The act of November 7, 1921, as I recall, only related back to the 17th of November, 1918, and any act that had been committed prior to November 17, 1918, is therefore barred by the statute of limitations, unless there was some act committed after that time which would connect it up. Therefore in that way a great proportion of the actually indictable offenses during the war were barred by the statute of limitations long before this division was organized. I do not think that is generally understood.

I know the entire House will share the regret of the gentleman from Nebraska to learn that but 35 criminal indictments have been secured. One of these, the infamous J. L. Phillips case, is now being tried in the courts of Washington, and it is to be hoped that within the very near future it will be possible to give to the gentleman from Nebraska the information he has so long and so earnestly sought.

I can verify the things which the chairman of the committee has stated relative to the necessity for this appropriation. I know that many of these cases now pending in court will be lost by default if this appropriation is not made. Cases are pending in court in which all of the information and evidence has not been gotten together, and the court is not going to postpone cases from time to time at the request of the Government without some very good reason therefor. I hope the House will approve the appropriation as submitted in this bill. I believe if this is done you will find that the Department of Justice, under the direction of Attorney General Stone, will go ahead with these cases and prosecute them, and prosecute them properly. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I am going to beg the indulgence of the House to use just a moment to explain the lack of my vote on the recent roll call.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that that should be done in the House.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. I am going to use less than half a minute.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection; but I think it would be better if it were done in the House instead of in committee.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. In view of the fact that I am obliged to leave right away, I ask your indulgence. This is merely to get it in the RECORD. The House Committee on the Judiciary had a meeting in Senator CUMMINS's office this afternoon and we left word with the cloakroom to call us. Through an oversight they did not call us, which accounts for the fact that several of us were unable to be present, which is a source of regret.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say for the information of the gentleman that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES] is going to make a general statement in respect of that matter when we go back into the House.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman desire to state in the RECORD how he would have voted if he had been present?

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. I would have voted "no."

Mr. KING. The gentleman would have been correct in his vote.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENAL INSTITUTIONS

Support of United States prisoners: For support of United States prisoners, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and the judiciary for the fiscal year 1924, $602,000.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska: On page 4, after line 23, insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"For investigation of the rolls of the inmates of the several United States penitentiaries in an effort to discover the name of any prisoner convicted on the charge of war graft as a result of prosecution by any special war-graft attorney appointed by the Attorney General of the United States, $1,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill, is legislation on an appropriation bill, and in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. In support of my position and in opposition to the point of order, I will say that I think the point of order is well taken forbidding me to legislate, but I can not consent, Mr. Chairman, that it is not germane. Indeed, we are dealing with penal institutions, and we have appropriated some millions of dollars for the purpose of sending somebody there; I can not find the names of the persons, and so I think it is entirely germane. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. For the purpose of suggesting that there does not seem to be enough Members here, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Well, I will withdraw it, Mr. Chairman.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9192) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with a recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we did not have time to deal with the soldier compensation legislation, I think we ought not to deal with this important matter without a quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not do that. This is a very urgent matter. The courts may be compelled to close any day if they do not get this relief.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the pleading of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and withdraw my suggestion if he will promise me that he will put forth his best effort to discover and tell me the names of any war grafter now in the penitentiary as a result of prosecutions conducted by special war-graft attorneys. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I would be delighted to do so if I could.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE SOLDIERS' BONUS

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, five Members of the House—the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LARSON], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MAJOR], the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. O'SULLIVAN], and myself—were detained at a joint meeting of the Judiciary Committees of the House and Senate at the other end of the Capitol in the office of the Vice President, and so were unable to be present at the roll call on the postponement of the consideration of the veto on the soldiers' bonus bill. We would like to have the RECORD show that we were absent on public business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an announcement in regard to the program of business. It is expected that tomorrow we will call up rules in the following order:

H. R. 8209, incorporating the Mississippi River Barge Line. H. R. 3316, two additional judges for the southern district of New York. H. R. 646, enforcement of agreement of arbitration in contracts. H. R. 5209, completion of Veterans' Bureau hospital program.

And, further, the Rules Committee has agreed to grant the following rules and expects to call them up in their order:

The McNary-Haugen bill, the postal employees' bill, and the amendment to the national banking act. As far as possible those rules will be called up in their order.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In accordance with the promise of last January, has the committee taken up for consideration the proposition that there shall be an official announcement in advance of the business to be transacted by the House?

Mr. SNELL. We have considered it a good many times in committee, but we have not come to an agreement yet.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is there any prospect that an agreement will be reached?

Mr. SNELL. I think there will be some time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman state whether his committee has come to any conclusion as to a rule for the legislative program on river and harbor legislation?

Mr. SNELL. That has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Is it going to be considered by the committee?

Mr. SNELL. The committee will consider all of the business as fast as possible, but it is not policy to vote out rules which there is no reasonable expectation can be considered.

CONDITION OF THE FARMER

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DENISON. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. MILLIGAN. The condition of the farmer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the conditions that are now confronting the farmer of this Nation. I believe I am in a position to know some of the problems of the farmer, as I represent an agricultural district. Having lived on a farm all my life, my home now being on a farm, I am directly interested in farming and in sympathy with the interests of agriculture.

The farmer is the only one who has taken a deep cut in his wages and stuck to his job; he is the only business man who has written off all his losses and gone down to bottom rock; he is the only one who has reached the depths of readjustment; and is the only one who has gone back to normalcy, which has meant for him financial ruin. Normalcy, the goal toward which America is striving, can not be reached until the farmer can return to the market as a buyer, and the farmer can not buy until there has been a readjustment of the prices of farm products on a fair level with the prices of other commodities that the farmer must buy. In other words, the dollar the farmer receives for his products must be worth 100 cents in a city market where he must buy his supplies.

The farmer buys one-third of the Nation's supplies. In his position to-day he can not buy in the Nation's market on an equal footing with others, because the dollar that he received for his produce will only buy 70 cents worth of supplies in that market, while his neighbor from the city goes into the country with his dollar and buys $1.30 worth of farm products. The result is that not only is the farmer affected but there has been a slump in all business in the cities. There will not be prosperity in other lines until the farmer's dollar has regained its fair purchasing power in the city market. The truth of this statement is proven by comparing the number of business failures for the last 30 years with the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar, which will show that the number of business failures increase whenever the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar drops below average.

The United States is a producing nation. We only consume about 60 per cent of our products, and we must have a foreign market for our surplus.

This administration has done nothing to aid in settling conditions in Europe that are a result of the war. This administration has no foreign policy; we have merely drifted since the signing of the armistice and have failed to take advantage of our position in the world's affairs and prosecute to a victorious conclusion the winning of the war by successful peace terms that the nations of Europe might now be at peace with each other and their people be engaged in peaceful and gainful occupations. The United States can not isolate itself from the rest of the world and still maintain its foreign markets, which we must have in order to dispose of our surplus farm products. If the United States can by some plan, I care not what, so long as it protects Americans' rights and aids in settling the conditions in Europe so that we can sell them our products, we will have done a great deal to solve the problems of the farmer of the United States.

This statement is borne out in the following extract from a report of observations made by a group of farm-bureau officials while visiting Europe:

> We have no hesitancy in saying, therefore, that unless the countries of Europe are enabled to put their political and economic life on a more normal and stable basis the American farmer must be adversely affected for a long time to come. The first and indispensable step toward stabilization is the settlement of the vexed problems of war reparations.

The farmer is suffering from the high freight rates that he must pay to ship his farm products to market. When he ships a car of hogs or cattle to a city market a great deal of his profit goes into the pockets of the railroads in the form of high freight rates.

In 1920 the Congress passed a law giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to fix or set the minimum freight rate that the railroad could charge for the transportation of any commodity. Since the passage of this law freight rates have been higher than ever before in the history of the railroads. A railroad at this time can not lower its freight rates without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The railroad wishing to lower its freight charges must file the tariff carrying the proposed reductions with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The other railroads can within 30 days file objections, and the commission may suspend it. A hearing is then held with the usual result that the railroad wishing to lower its rates is informed that the other railroads can not compete with it if the rates are lowered. Therefore, they can not make the reduction in freight rates as requested. The result is that the high rates must remain in order to protect the weaker railroad lines. I have introduced in this House a bill that will cure this evil and reduce freight rates. This bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not have the authority to set a minimum freight rate. This will give the railroads the right to lower freight rates whenever they please, and in this way you will revive competition between the railroads. If you will pass this bill, you will see an immediate reduction of freight rates by the railroads, which will mean a great saving, not only to the farmers but also to the consumers of the United States who are now paying these high freight rates ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect some weak railroad. I would mention that there is no law on the statute books to protect and guarantee a profit to the farmers, all of whom are now financial wrecks as the result of such class legislation.

The farmer is to-day paying the high tariff rates that are placed upon the necessities of life and supplies for the farm that he must have to sustain his family and carry on his farm work. He does not pay these high tariff rates in order to raise revenue to maintain the Government; he pays them as a tribute to the manufacturers of the United States. Under the present tariff schedule there has been a vain attempt to fool the farmer by placing certain farm commodities on the protected list. It was an attempt to camouflage the vicious schedules of the Fordney-McCumber tariff law and make the farmer believe he was being benefited by this legislation. This is impossible. The farmers are not fools; as a class they are the best informed people of our Nation.

The Fordney-McCumber law places a tariff duty of 30 cents a bushel on wheat. That can not raise the price of wheat, as the price of wheat is fixed in the world market; we compete with the world in raising wheat and ship our surplus wheat to a foreign market, so what effect can a duty on wheat have in raising the price, creating a world demand, or reducing the world's supply of wheat?

A duty of 1 cent a pound is placed on rice; this is of no benefit to the rice farmer of the Nation, as we export rice, and the price, as in the case of wheat, is fixed by the market of the world. We export rice to China and Japan, and the price depends on the world's supply and demand. This is the case of many other grains and cereals produced by the American farmer that bear a tariff which neither does the farmer any good or any harm.

There is a duty of 2.03 cents per pound on sugar. Only 3 per cent of all sugar consumed in the United States is produced by the American sugar farmer, 97 per cent of the sugar consumed by our Nation is imported, and the consumer must pay a duty of 2.03 cents per pound on every pound of sugar consumed in order to protect the sugar farmer who only produces 3 per cent of that sugar. The cost of this to the consumer is $192,400,000 each year, of which the farmers of our Nation pay $48,100,000. This duty is not put on sugar to protect the cane growers or the beet growers, but for the benefit of the great interests engaged in the manufacture and refining of sugar.

There is a duty placed on wool which amounts to 12.5 cents per pound in the condition it comes from the sheep. We do not produce enough wool for our own use and must import wool from other countries. The price is fixed after the tariff is paid in our own market inside the tariff wall. Only one farmer in a hundred are sheep raisers in commercial numbers. Giving the sheep-raising farmer the benefit of this tariff in raising the price of his wool would mean an increase in price of about $37,500,000 to the woolgrowing farmer, while, on the other hand, the tariff duty is shifted onto the consumer; the cost to the consumer would be around $91,000,000. All farmers of the Nation pay this tariff in the increased price of clothing that he must buy to clothe himself and family.

Also a tariff is placed on cattle; this is not a benefit to the farmers but a loss to them. The farmers of the corn-growing States feed cattle and do not raise enough cattle for feeding purposes. "Feeders," as these cattle are called, are grown where grass land is cheap, and shipped to corn-growing States to be fed for market. This tariff cuts off our supply of feeders from Canada. The effect has been to increase the price of the feeders to the farmers of the corn States.

We have seen that the tariff on farm products is merely a case of playing both ends against the middle in the case of the farmer. Let us now look at the other side of the picture.

This law places a duty on everything the farmer must buy and thereby increases the cost to the farmer. The Fordney-McCumber tariff schedules now in effect cost the American consumer from three to four billions of dollars yearly, and cost the farmers of the United States, as stated by the American Farm Bureau Federation, $426,000,000 each year. It not only increases the high cost of living but hurts agriculture, labor, and business. The nations of Europe can not trade with us with the tariff wall built by this law.

In the report of the farm bureau officials, a majority of whom are Republicans, the following statement is made relative to the effect of the tariff on foreign trade:

> But whether for barter or for money there are serious obstacles to the full and necessary development of international trade that are of gratuitous American making. Our tariff laws are in many instances prohibitive rather than protective.
>
> They make it impossible for foreign countries to sell to us and therefore impossible for them to buy from us. International trade is literally a trade and exchange. If there is nothing that we can take in exchange for what we offer there is no trade. Nations can not buy without selling.
> These nations must be able to trade their goods for our goods, including our surplus farm products. The long standing argument of the Republicans has been that we must have a protective tariff in order to protect our manufacturers against competition with the foreign manufacturer, yet under the present law duties are placed upon many articles manufactured in the United States which are shipped to foreign markets and sold in competition with all the world without the protection of a tariff. This being an undeniable fact, then the American manufacturer does not need a tariff duty to protect him against competition. It is class legislation for the benefit of the big interests of the United States that allows them to rob the American people of billions of dollars each year.

Farming is the largest business we have in the United States to-day, and has received the least consideration at the hands of Congress.

The total value of all farm property as shown by the census of 1920 was $77,924,100,338. Of this farms and buildings on the farms were valued at $66,316,002,602; implements and machinery, $3,594,772,928; and livestock, $8,013,324,808. The mortgaged indebtedness on the farms of the Nation was $4,003,767,192. This was an increase of 131.9 per cent over the mortgaged indebtedness of 1910. This amount does not include the indebtedness carried in chattel mortgages or the unsecured indebtedness of the farmer, which, if taken into account, would greatly increase this amount. The average rate of interest on the mortgage debts is 6.1 per cent, while the rates of interest on the chattel mortgages and unsecured debts are, in some cases, as high as 12 per cent. You will see by this the great burden the farmer is carrying in paying the interest upon this enormous debt.

Congress, by the farm loan bank act, has made it possible for the farmer to obtain long-time loans at a low rate of interest, which has been a great benefit. But, as I see the situation, Congress should do something now to aid the farmer to get out of debt.

Taxes on farm lands have increased so rapidly that they threaten to absorb farm-land values. If this continues, the net return of our farm lands will be absorbed in tax payments. Dr. Richard Ely, director of the institution for research in land economics and public utilities at the University of Wisconsin, states that taxes in 1920 were absorbing 66 per cent of the net rent of all farms rented for cash. He also shows, while taxes show no tendency to decrease but, on the contrary, a tendency to increase, land values as compared with their greatest height about 1920 have fallen over 20 per cent according to estimates of the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Doctor Ely concedes that the underlying cause of increased and increasing public expenditures is found in the development of State and Nation as cooperative institutions for promoting public welfare. The State governments, as well as our National Government, are constantly creating new boards and bureaus to interfere in the private affairs of our citizens and at great expense to the taxpayers.

In my State the present State administration has very materially increased the taxes on farm land by assessing it at its full value of farm land when it was at its highest. Many farms in my district are now selling at public sale at a price much less than their assessed value as shown by the tax books. Taxes can be reduced by reducing the cost of National, State, county, and municipal governments. This must be done if the farmer is to recover.

Congress has been in session for five months and as yet no act of legislation has been passed that will tend to cure these maladies from which the farmer is suffering. This House long ago passed a bill relieving the man with an income but no relief was carried in this legislation for the farmer; he has had no income for the last four years on which to pay an income tax. His relief must come by reducing the high taxes, high tariff rates, high freight rates, and by the United States aiding in settling conditions in Europe so that those nations may buy our surplus farm products, and by so readjusting conditions that the purchasing power of the dollar the farmer receives for his products will be worth 100 cents in the city market.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 8350) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Messrs. MORIN, HULL of Iowa, SPEAKS, WAINWRIGHT, FISHER, McSWAIN, and HILL of Alabama, at the request of Mr.

JAMES, of the Military Affairs Committee, for two days, May 16 and 17, on account of official visit to United States Military Academy at West Point, as members of the Board of Visitors of the Academy.

To Mr. COLLINS, for three days, at the request of Mr. RANKIN, on account of important business.

To Mr. LEAVITT, for two days, Saturday, May 17, and Monday, May 19, on account of invitation to speak at dedication of veterans' monument, at Portland, Me.

CRITICISM OF CONGRESS

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD which I made yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. ROSENBLOOM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3684. An act for the enrollment and allotment of members of the Lac du Flambeau Band of Lake Superior Chippewas, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes;

PRINT OF PRESIDENT'S VETO MESSAGE

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the President's veto message of the bonus bill be printed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the necessity for this when we are going to vote upon it on Saturday next?

Mr. LONGWORTH. We are not going to vote upon it until next Saturday, and I think probably there will be a great demand for them.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, what is it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the President's veto message be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I am almost impelled to be disrespectful, but I shall not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House on Wednesday next for 10 minutes, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I dislike intensely to object, but I do not think general leave ought to be given at this time. For instance, next week we are to have up the Haugen-McNary bill, with perhaps three days of general debate, and it will be very easy for the gentleman to get in under that; but I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PROHIBITION

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address by the Hon. Nicholas Murray Butler.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I object.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 16, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 9192) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INVESTIGATION OF COMMERCIAL WHEAT-FLOUR MILLING

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 212 (agreed to January 18, 1922, 67th Cong., 2d sess.), the report of the commission relative to the wheat-flour milling industry, which was ordered to lie on the table.

SALARIES IN THE VETERANS' BUREAU

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement showing by location, salary range, and bureau designation employees receiving an aggregate annual salary of $2,000 and over as of May 1, 1924, for the central office, and as of April 1, 1924, for the field, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the petition of the constituent bodies of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and other bodies, praying for the participation of the United States in the Permanent Court of International Justice, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Council of the New York Commandery, Military Order of Foreign Wars, at New York, N. Y., protesting against the passage of House Joint Resolution 180, for the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, on behalf of the executive council of the federation meeting at Montreal, Quebec, praying for the passage of the Howell-Barkley railway labor bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from Local No. 89, Italian Dressmakers' Union, of New York, N. Y., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Western Union telegram]

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 15, 1924.

United States Senators, Washington, D. C., greetings:

HONORABLE SIRS: This organization, the Italian Dressmakers' Union, Local No. 89, I. L. G. W. U., respectfully urges the voting of the joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States for the protection of children of our Republic, limiting, prohibiting, and regulating the employment of said children under 18 years of age.

ITALIAN DRESSMAKERS' UNION, LOCAL NO. 89,
I. L. G. W. U. EXECUTIVE BOARD,
LUIGI ANTONINI, General Secretary.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have received a large number of telegrams relating to the Howell-Barkley bill. One which I have in my hand explains the view of the persons from whom the telegrams have come. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Western Union telegram]

SALT LAKE CITY, May 13, 1924.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As representative of Foundrymen Craft, am instructed strenuously oppose and enlist your assistance in opposition Howell-Barkley bill, which we have read. Will work uncalled-for injustice on 153,000 railroad workers and deny more than 106,000,000 public due consideration.

JAMES L. KARREN,
Chairman for Foundrymen.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. Mr. HALE submitted an amendment providing for an examination and survey of Portland Harbor, Me., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8914, the rivers and harbors authorization bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION BILL

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3161) to create the inland waterways corporation for the purpose of carrying out the mandate and purpose of Congress as expressed in sections 201 and 500 of the transportation act, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ORIGIN OF THE WORLD WAR

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 225), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations shall cause to be prepared for the Senate an authoritative and impartial analysis and abstract of all authentic important evidence heretofore made available in printed form, or otherwise readily accessible, bearing on the origin of the World War, together with the conclusions of the committee of inquiry as to the relative responsibility therefor.

2. The Committee on Foreign Relations is authorized and directed to appoint a "committee of inquiry" of seven impartial citizens of the United States, trained in historical research, to assemble and analyse this evidence, applying to it reasonable and scientific rules of legal and historical criticism, and summarising the conclusions to which it points. This committee shall not be composed of persons in the Government service. They shall serve without compensation, but shall be reimbursed for their actual and necessary traveling expenses, and for their maintenance while actually engaged in the work of the committee shall receive an allowance not exceeding $9 per diem. The Committee on Foreign Relations shall have authority to employ such additional clerical service as the committee of inquiry may require at a cost not to exceed $5,000. The office of the committee of inquiry shall be in the Committee on Foreign Relations, or elsewhere as determined by the Committee on Foreign Relations. All expenditures incidental to the formation and operation of the committee of inquiry and the printing of its reports shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

3. The committee of inquiry shall submit its abstracts and conclusions to the Committee on Foreign Relations not later than February 1, 1925, which shall be printed for the information of the Senate.

REPORT OF NEAR EAST RELIEF

On motion of Mr. LODGE, it was Ordered, That the report of the Near East Relief for the year ended December 31, 1923, transmitted to the Senate on April 24, 1924, be printed as a Senate document.

SPECULATIONS IN WHEAT (S. DOC. NO. 110)

On motion of Mr. LADD, it was Ordered, That the communication of the Secretary of Agriculture, with the accompanying report of the Grain Futures Administration under the grain futures act of September 21, 1922, with respect to trading in grain futures on the Chicago Board of Trade, transmitted to the Senate on May 3, 1924, in response to Senate Resolution 9, agreed to January 8, 1924, be printed as a Senate document.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR STANFIELD

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting and thoughtful address made a few nights ago by my colleague, the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], entitled "Have faith in our Republic."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT N. STANFIELD, OF OREGON, OVER STATION WRC AT WASHINGTON, D. C., SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 10, 1924

HAVE FAITH IN OUR REPUBLIC

The history of our Republic is the marvel of the world.

Our agricultural development; our industrial development; our transportation systems; our standard of living; our inventive genius; our peace-loving spirit; our ability to fight in defense of right, but never for conquest, are the pride of Americans everywhere and the envy and hope of all other peoples.

Though an infant in years as nations go, yet we are the bankers of the world.

But all these things, alone, do not justify a continued faith in our Republic.

During the recent war years we so often did that which seemed impossible; we raised fabulous sums of money; and though not a military nation, we raised, equipped, trained, and transported a magnificent army in record time and with this added strength of American manhood to the war-worn armies of our allies the victory for civilization and democracy was won.

By these victories we have come to feel that nothing is impossible to us; but through these accomplishments, and this faith in ourselves they have inspired, we have formed habits of waste, indifference, overconfidence, and even arrogance, that without extreme care on our part will lead to the sowing of the seed of our own destruction, for the Divine injunction:

"When ye think ye stand, take heed lest ye fall," applies to nations as well as to individuals.

No country involved in the great World War has weathered the financial and industrial storms of the years since the armistice was signed—the years of readjustment and reconstruction—as safely and successfully as has our own United States.

Our tax burdens, it is true, have been heavy, but even so they are not to be compared with the tax burdens of our allies.

Our people have been employed at good wages; our National Budget has been balanced, and the national income has been sufficient to pay all current expenses of the Government. The interest on the public debt has been paid, and enough on the principal to insure its payment in full at an early date.

During all this time our financial system, the American dollar, has not suffered in its value or reputation, and indeed has become the standard of value everywhere. The value of the pound, the franc, the kronin, and the mark is now measured by the American dollar, ofttimes to their discredit.

But this is not enough to justify faith in the endurance of our Republic.

That firm and abiding faith in our Republic must be founded on the individual character of our people.

If the individual citizen is honest, industrious, and thrifty, if the public official is reliable, faithful, and incorruptible, then our Republic is founded upon a rock, and our faith in its endurance is justified.

That the individual citizen is honest, industrious, and thrifty is proven by our record of readjustment and reconstruction since the war by our production, our exports, our imports, and our increasing bank deposits.

During the period of the war we gathered money by the billions from the people and spent it like irresponsible sons of multimillionaires.

Since the war we have been engrossed in problems of readjustment, and now that we feel we are safely back to the ways of peace the spirit of calling our public officials to account prevails.

All this is as it should be, but as we call these officials to book we must remember that it takes a lifetime to build a reputation for honesty, integrity, and morality, and such a precious thing should not be held lightly or destroyed in a day unless worthy evidence, calmly considered, justifies it.

Honorable men—executive, investigators, committeemen, and prosecutors—charged with the responsibility of conducting investigations have a solemn duty to perform toward the individual as well as to the Government and the public.

We must remember that fairy tales do not always come from fairies, but sometimes "wolves in sheep's clothing, seeking whom they may devour," prompted by desire for revenge or love of publicity, find spinning fairy tales a pleasant diversion from the night life of big cities and the criminal atmosphere of the underworld, particularly so when Uncle Sam pays their expenses and witness fees, and there is no danger of contradiction from the dead and slight risk of punishment from the living.

The voluntary statements of the criminal and unworthy sometimes lead to corroborating evidence, and because of that must be received, but should never be received with open doors or given publicity until worthy evidence of guilt has been secured; otherwise the name and reputation of no man is safe.

An investigation should not be closed or discontinued until the last bit of evidence that will either exonerate or convict the accused official has been taken, but I have no sympathy with methods that will destroy the lives and usefulness of worthy men and women by publicity given the mouthings of criminals, adventurers, and dope fiends.

We should either listen to the statements of such unworthy and unreliable witnesses behind closed doors, and treat their statements in confidence, observing the rules of grand-jury investigations, or we should observe the rules of evidence adopted by trial courts, and thus deny this flock of character wolves their chance to destroy those against whom they hold grudge, or their chance to satisfy a craving for publicity at the expense and sacrifice of worthy men and women.

It is true that occasional cases of corruption are disclosed among public officials, but these cases are rare and far between.

It is true that our press carries news stories of crimes committed daily, but we must remember that through our modern method of gathering and disseminating news through the press service associations all the papers publish the same story of the same crime, usually in all its sordid colors.

It is also true that only the unusual and extraordinary have any news value. The brilliant and the criminal, and ofttimes the brilliant criminal, furnish the news for our press and writers. This is because there are but few either brilliant or criminal, and therefore their doings and sayings are unusual and extraordinary, have news value, and find their way into the press.

If the brilliant and the criminal were many, their doings and sayings would be commonplace and have no news value. The doings and sayings of the good are many and common and therefore excite no comment.

The great mass of our American citizenship are good, honest, industrious, faithful, home-loving, God-fearing men and women, and it is upon this safe, sound, solid foundation the security of our Republic rests.

A little fringe, some possibly at the top and a little fringe at the bottom of our great social fabric is weak, corrupt, and unsound, but the fabric in between these fringes is woven of warp and woof the best this world affords, and because of this our faith in this Republic is justified.

Have faith in our Republic!

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I notice that the Senate last evening in one minute's time passed a very meritorious bill, in my judgment, raising the salaries of the policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia some two hundred-odd dollars per year. I am very anxious, as I have indicated several times, to bring before the Senate for consideration Senate bill 1898, which provides for the readjustment of the salaries of 300,000 postal employees throughout the country. However, I believe in regularity so far as it is possible to adhere to it. I had intended to ask unanimous consent this morning that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill and endeavor to get it through to-day. I recognize, however, that the Senate is in recess, and we shall have no morning hour. As the unfinished business, the War Department appropriation bill, is before the Senate, I shall not attempt to displace that measure. I am simply taking this occasion to give the Senate notice that in the first morning hour we have I shall ask unanimous consent to consider the postal employees' salary bill and, failing in my effort to get unanimous consent, I shall move that the bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey has given notice that the first time we have a morning hour following an adjournment of the Senate he will ask for the consideration of the bill which is now upon the calendar for the relief of postal employees of the United States. I hope he will do so, and that the bill will be advanced, if necessary, and certainly considered and passed during the present session of the Congress, for it is a bill which proposes to give relief which has long been needed.

Mr. President, I have here an editorial from the Gazette-Times, of Pittsburgh, Pa., which states some good reasons for the advancement of the consideration and passage of the bill at the present session of Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh (Pa.) Gazette-Times, Friday, April 9, 1924]

PASS THE POSTAL PAY BILL

The bill providing increased compensation for postal employees has reached that stage in Congress where, unless favorable action on it be prompt, it will be lost. But a few weeks of the present session remain. Business is piling up. In the closing days there is to be expected a degree of congestion in which, this being a presidential election year, legislation that can be turned to political advantage will receive an undue share of attention from many Representatives and Senators.

The postal employees' pay bill is in no sense political. It is a measure that might aptly be entitled a bill to do justice to upwards of 300,000 indispensable and always faithful employees of this great and rich country. In a circular describing the United States Postal System, Postmaster General Harry S. New describes the department under his direction as "the biggest single business in the world." It is that. But it is far more than a business. It is a public utility without whose uninterrupted and efficient functioning every other business in the country would be incalculably hampered.

A primary interest of the American people is the Postal Service. It is an interest to be fostered. It ought not to be necessary for the men and women in it who are devoting their lives to the service of the people to ask for adequate compensation. This should be volunteered. It is not, unfortunately. Whether or not the Postal Service sustains itself is not a question for consideration when the subject of remunerating its employees is up. It does the people's work and the people are not entitled to unremunerated service.

The postal employees' pay bill should be taken up immediately and passed, the rates allowed being commensurate with the services rendered and in keeping with the requirements of the men and women affected for maintaining the American standard of living. Unless this is done the country will be disgraced.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT GUIDE BOOK

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate in connection with the pending conference report on the independent offices appropriation bill I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement of Miss Ina C. Emery before the House subcommittee on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill on January 14, 1909, and a letter of the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations dated July 2, 1923, to the Secretary of War relating to the same subject matter, namely, the Washington Monument Guide Book. The text of Miss Emery's hearing before the committee in 1909 shows very clearly that the intent of the legislation subsequently enacted was to authorize the sale of her Monument Guide Book at the Monument. The purport of the letter of Chairman MADDEN, of the Appropriations Committee, in 1923 cites the law governing the matter, shows her book, which has been at the Monument since 1901, is in pursuance of that law and involves no expenditure of public money, and urges the restoration of her right to have the book sold at the Monument, a right which the War Department discontinued, effective July 1, 1923. I merely submit this matter so that Senators may be informed of the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the matter will be printed as requested.

The letter and statement referred to are as follows:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1923.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In Statutes at Large, volume 35, page 615, will be found the following:

> "That hereafter no advertisement of any kind shall be displayed and no articles of any kind, except a guidebook to the Monument, shall be sold in or around the Washington Monument."

Then later, in Statutes at Large, volume 35, page 997, there appears the following:

> "That hereafter no advertising of any kind shall be displayed and no articles of any kind shall be sold in or around the Monument except upon the written authority of the Secretary of War."

In pursuance of this authority, Miss Emery has been selling a guidebook to the Monument, which she has prepared at her own expense. The sale of this book involves no expenditure of public money, and she has paid the Government $75 per annum for the privilege. Recently you have ordered the sale of the book discontinued.

It seems to me that in view of the expense incurred by Miss Emery in the preparation of the book and the satisfaction which its sale has given all these years to the visiting public she should be permitted to continue its sale.

I shall consider it a personal favor if you can find it consistent to withdraw the order recently issued by you and reinstate Miss Emery's right to the sale of the book at the Monument.

[From hearing before House Appropriations Committee, January 14, 1909]

STATEMENT OF MISS INA C. EMERY

The CHAIRMAN. Miss Emery, you have called our attention to a provision in the sundry civil law for the current fiscal year in connection with the Washington Monument, asking that it may be abrogated. It reads as follows:

> "Provided, That no advertisement of any kind shall be displayed and no articles of any kind shall be sold in or around the Monument."

That is the Washington Monument, here in the city?

Miss EMERY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What reason have you for asking that this provision be abrogated, for wanting this law changed?

Miss EMERY. It is because I have a book, the only book that has ever been published, containing all the inscriptions, the history, and a description of the construction of the Washington Monument. It is the only one that has ever been prepared, and it has cost me over $1,600 to prepare the book, and it has been there for nearly six years, without a single adverse criticism from anywhere. On the contrary, I have had letters from all over the country, and even from Europe, telling me what a pleasure it has been to the writers to read an inscription on a tablet that an aunt or an uncle or some one had placed there, and it is the only book of the kind ever published.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you selling this book at the time that the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds recommended to the committee the adoption of this paragraph?

Miss EMERY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know about the paragraph at the time of its adoption?

Miss EMERY. No, sir; I had no intimation of it.

Mr. KEIFER. When was that passed?

The CHAIRMAN. At the last session of Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What objection have you to advertisements that do not affect your book?

Miss EMERY. I have no objection. I only want my book placed back there.

Mr. VREELAND. She wants the right to sell her book there. The right has been taken away.

Mr. RODENBERG. They construed that provision in such a way as to exclude her book.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Suppose the law is changed so that it will not exclude the selling of your book?

Miss EMERY. That is all I ask.

Mr. VREELAND. She is not seeking to exclude anybody else.

Miss EMERY. No. I only ask that my book may be sold there, as it is a benefit to the public, and I think that Mr. Tawney knows of the various persons who have interested themselves in it who know the book and know what it has done.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Can anyone tell why that law was passed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. It was enacted at the last session of Congress on the recommendation of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds. It was placed as a provision on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I was not here at the time and did not get a chance to hear a thing about it. What reason did he give?

The CHAIRMAN. He wanted to shut out the vending of anything at that place, because, as he said, if you will allow one you would have to license others.

Mr. GRAFF. There is no book vended there except this book, is there, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not recall the testimony now. My recollection, however, is that there were applications for permission for the vending of all sorts of articles—postal cards, souvenir postal cards, and souvenirs of all kinds.

Mr. GRAFF. But there is no history of the Monument except this one?

The CHAIRMAN. Not that I know anything about.

Mr. VREELAND. We could amend the provision by excepting books describing the Monument, or views of the Monument.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a guide to the Monument?

Miss EMERY. It is a guide to the Monument. There is nothing in it except a guide to the Monument.

The CHAIRMAN. Then if we were to amend this provision so as to read that no advertisement of any kind should be displayed, or any articles should be sold except this book, that would be satisfactory to you?

Miss EMERY. Yes, sir; that is all I ask.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not see why they should prohibit anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. There was reason for this legislation. Of course, the committee did not know anything about this book at the time, but if you allow these people to go there indiscriminately you would have a crowd of people selling things there, especially during the week of inauguration and perhaps weeks afterwards.

Mr. VREELAND. It is a great convenience for the people to go there and buy it. I want to look at it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. This is of benefit to visitors, in that it will enable them to understand the history of the Monument and the history of the inscriptions inside of it?

Miss EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. I think we can amend that in a way to be satisfactory to you.

Mr. VREELAND. I wish you would send up two or three copies of that book. When it comes up in the House we would like to show just what it is.

Miss EMERY. I have already sent a copy to each member of the committee. I thank you, gentlemen, very much.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am not going to consume very much time in the discussion of the amendment proposed to the pending bill looking toward a modification of what is known as the fourth section of the transportation act. I have been somewhat disappointed in the tenor of the arguments of certain Senators in reference to this matter. There has never been before the Senate or before the American people a subject of more vital importance, one more far-reaching in its effect, than the proper solution of the problem involved in what is known as the fourth section of the transportation act. It is not a question between the partisans of the railroads and the partisans of water transportation; it is a question of how a rapidly developing country may meet the needs of its people in transporting the rapidly increasing products of the Nation.

There has been discussed here on the floor the question as to what section of the country may or may not be benefited by a modification in the wording of the fourth section. The relations of the railroads to themselves, in my opinion, do not enter into the proper discussion of the question. The real question is, How we may utilize to the best advantage of the American people the available facilities for transportation.

What are those facilities? There are only two—the natural and the artificial. The domain of the one in a certain respect does not enter the domain of the other. They are both here and are available. The question involved is, What relation shall the two facilities bear to each other for the good of the American people and not primarily for the good of those who may furnish the facilities in the one case or the other? The late Senator Newlands, of Nevada, who was the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, spent his senatorial life in trying to impress Congress with the fact that we had those two facilities, and that the part of statesmanship in this body was so to correlate the two that they would perform the maximum service for the American people.

Before going specifically into the relation of the two facilities, I will say that a glance at the map on the wall of the Senate Chamber showing certain already accomplished facilities and indicating those which may hereafter be furnished will convince every man on the floor that nature and art have furnished us as they have furnished no other nation on earth with the potential facilities of moving adequately and freely with the least possible delay and cost all the possible production of America.

Starting at our extreme northern boundary we find that there a friendly nation is now collaborating with us in determining the feasibility of opening the St. Lawrence Canal and making a gateway from the Great Lakes out to the ocean that will give to the people of the North and Northeast water facilities by means of a great highway which will be there eternally, which will not involve the building of switches and pass tracks, and which will be available for all the possible tonnage that may be committed to it.

Then our coast line from the extreme northeast down around the peninsula of Florida, in conjunction with that magnificent piece of engineering, cutting the link that binds the North and South America, the Panama Canal, affords a highway around to the western coast and to the extreme border of the northwest, and renders possible with expedition and efficiency to transport our tremendously increasing tonnage by water from the eastern shore to the western shore and vice versa.

Outside of the less than one-fourth of our continental boundary, there is nature's great highway, with natural facilities for transmitting the products of all the people within a reasonable distance of that coast line by means of the intercoastal trade.

Then, in the center of our continent we have a highway, a natural transportation facility. The Mississippi River and its tributaries are in effect a great transportation system running from the Gulf of Mexico practically to our extreme northern border.

The question, therefore, with us to-day is not one of the selfish interests of the railroads or those who have invested in securities that make them possible, but the question with us is, What are we going to do in reference to maintaining both of these systems in their full efficiency?

Now, I desire to call attention to some facts upon which I wish to predicate what I have to say. I have before me a very enlightening table furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I believe they have agreed that in about every 10 years, not to exceed 12 years, the tonnage of the country doubles. Therefore, transportation facilities should likewise increase. All of us know that we have a vast territory which yet needs pioneering. I want to read from this table as to the mileage of the railroads in America from 1910 to 1923, inclusive.

In 1910 we had 240,831 miles of railway.

Mr. KING. Do those figures include the short as well as the long railroads.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the figures represent the total mileage.

In 1911 there were 246,238 miles of railway; in 1912, 249,852 miles.

I am reading these figures, instead of asking to have the table printed in the RECORD, in order that Senators may follow them and notice the per cent of increase in railroad mileage in nearly a decade and a half, during which time our tonnage has more than doubled.

In 1913 there were 253,470 miles of railway in the United States; in 1914, 256,547 miles; in 1915, 257,569 miles; in 1916, 259,705 miles; in 1917, 259,705 miles. You will notice that in those two years not a mile of track was added. In 1918 there were 258,507 miles of railway, an actual decrease; in 1919, 258,525 miles; in 1920, 259,941 miles; in 1921, 258,362 miles; in 1922, 257,834 miles. We were beginning at that time to enter a period of railroad activity, so far as volume of business was concerned, that culminated in the peak in 1923. In 1923 there were 258,183 miles of railway; so that in 1923 we had less miles than we had in 1916.

As a companion to that, let us see what has been done on a stationary construction of mileage facilities. Here is a very interesting and enlightening table to apply immediately to the one I have just read.

In 1910, on the mileage that I have just given the Senate—240,831 miles—there was an investment in road and equipment of $14,558,000,000. I am just giving the sums in round numbers. In 1911 there was an investment of $15,612,000,000; in 1912, $16,005,000,000; in 1913, $16,589,000,000; in 1914, $17,164,000,000; in 1915, $17,441,000,000; in 1916, $17,843,000,000; in 1917, $18,574,000,000; in 1918, $18,985,000,000; in 1919, $19,300,000,000; in 1920, $19,849,000,000; in 1921, $20,329,000,000; in 1922, $20,580,000,000; in 1923, $21,480,000,000.

So that this curious fact occurs: By reference to these tables it will be found that in 1916 we had 259,705 miles of road, with an investment value of $17,843,000,000, while in 1923 we had 258,183 miles of road, and an investment value of $21,480,000,000; showing that our roads, though static as to the matter of additional mileage and increased territory covered, had increased their investment in the roads already operating from $17,843,000,000 to $21,480,000,000.

In conjunction with that table, in order that the Senators may as nearly as possible get a grasp of just what is being done and what the increased burden may be on the people who pay for these facilities, I take a table showing the investment in road and equipment in excess of retirements from 1912. I did not get the figures for 1910 and 1911. That is the amount, as claimed by the roads, that was necessary for their upkeep in road and equipment in excess of retirements:

Expenditures for road and equipment, 1912–1923 (roads of Class I and II and their nonoperating subsidiaries)

Investment in road and equipment in excess of retirements for year ended:
June 30:
1912	$477,191,155
1913	600,589,302
1914	550,513,731
1915	263,729,096
1916	281,135,100
December 31:
1916	354,025,570
1917	571,746,523
1918	488,117,653
1919	335,219,123
1920	544,463,696
1921	458,103,187
1922	342,137,181
1923 (estimate from advance figures compiled by Bureau of Railway Economics for Class I roads only)	900,000,000

In the hearings before the committee, Mr. President, as you personally are aware, and all members of the committee, the statement has been made over and over again that in order for the railroads to meet the necessary expansion of traffic they must be put in a position where they can invite vast volumes of new money. That has been the basis of the contention for the present transportation act. The question before us is, Is that justifiable, not upon the question of a reasonable return to the roads, but are we justified under our present system in pouring in this vast volume of taxes collected through transportation to expand our railroad trackage and facilities, to the total neglect of an auxiliary that nature has given us, and that could relieve to a large extent the so-called congestion and necessity for transportation by allowing through proper legislation an opportunity to determine whether or not our rivers and our coast traffic can be filled with carrier vessels?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. KING. It may not be in line with the argument the Senator is making, and I apologize if I divert him. I am interested in the statement made by the Senator that the investment in road and equipment and the upkeep of the roads in 1923 was substantially $900,000,000, a considerable increase over the investment for like purposes during the five or six or seven preceding years. May I inquire of the Senator whether any part of that $900,000,000 was obtained from the Government in payment of amounts due the railroads, or was any part of it obtained from the sale of bonds or stocks, or was it all obtained from what might be denominated net earnings; and then, finally, may I inquire whether dividends were paid upon any of those roads which expended that $900,000,000, in addition, of course, to the expenditure?

Mr. SMITH. The expenditure of the $900,000,000 during 1923 was out of the earnings of the roads. It consisted—and I have tables here which I may insert in the RECORD—of making up the deficit or the lack of motive power and freight cars. I have those items here. That was one of the principal items—that the roads were lacking in equipment of traction power and lacking in equipment of carrier facilities, box cars, and so forth.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit another inquiry, do the figures which the Senator has before him show, or is there any information before his committee showing, whether any part of that $900,000,000 included what might be called expenditures for ordinary wear and repairs, or was it all what might be called capital investment?

Mr. SMITH. That $900,000,000, in so far as it pertained to their equipment of cars and engines, of course, was chargeable to capital account, because it was a permanent improvement on the road. The Interstate Commerce Commission have a system by which they keep an account of the deterioration of the different parts of the equipment of the road.

I want to call attention, right along with these tables, starting with 1910, showing the increased mileage and the investment in that mileage, to the revenue derived from the mileage, so that we might have an intelligent comprehension of what facilities we have and what they are costing to keep up what is practically a static institution. These are the figures furnished me by the commission as to the return upon this property.

Let us take the question of freight revenue. In 1913 the railroads collected freight revenue of $2,140,000,000. If Senators will bear in mind that the tonnage about doubles, to be conservative, every 12 years, they can follow intelligently this table of the revenue receipts:

1913	$2,140,000,000
1914	2,060,000,000
1915	1,978,000,000
1916	2,561,000,000
1917	2,820,000,000
1918	3,441,000,000
1919	3,543,000,000
1920	4,317,000
1921	3,911,000,000
1922	4,007,000,000
1923	4,649,000,000

That shows an increase for 1923 over 1913 of more than 100 per cent.

Mr. KING. Was that for freight alone, or for freight and passengers?

Mr. SMITH. That is freight alone. I intend to have these tables incorporated; but the revenue from the passenger receipts is possibly more striking than the other. For the years I have enumerated the passenger returns were as follows:

1913	$679,000,000
1914	684,000,000
1915	629,000,000
1916	674,000,000
1917	825,000,000
1918	1,032,000,000
1919	1,178,000,000
1920	1,287,000,000
1921	1,152,000,000
1922	1,076,000,000
1923	1,148,000,000

I have given these tables and the increases to show that without any additional trackage our tonnage has more than doubled, and the revenues have more than doubled; yet the cry from the roads and from the people is for additional facilities for transportation.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an interruption right there?

Mr. SMITH. I will.

Mr. KING. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying. The Senator has given in dollars and cents the increases in the rates by the railroads, both in the matter of freight and passengers, for the years stated. What will the increase in tonnage be? It is apparent with the increases in the passenger and freight rates, and there might be a very large increase in the aggregate, and yet not be a very great increase in the tonnage.

Mr. SMITH. I gave the figures for the tonnage a moment ago.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senators' pardon; I did not know that.

Mr. SMITH. I made a statement to the effect that in every 10 years the tonnage about doubles, so that the increase in the revenue was about indicated in the increase in the amount of traffic carried; but the point I am making is that we have gotten our transportation facilities now to the point where they can not and do not meet the necessities of expanding commerce, and can not meet them without additional trackage, with the enormous cost incident to the purchase of material and the construction of new roads.

As I called to the attention of the Senate a moment ago, we have a potential water system in America, running from the Gulf of Mexico practically to our northern boundary. We have the Panama Canal. We have now in course of investigation the feasibility of building the St. Lawrence Canal. Do we know, or have we been in a position to test, whether transportation on our waterways is feasible, economical, and practical? It is upon the fourth section that the answer to that question depends, and has depended from the very beginning of railroading in this country as a means of transportation.

I submit this to the Senate: If we allow the railroads to meet water competition, and put their rates a point below the figure at which the water carrier can live and carry the freight—and that is admitted to be lower than the railroad can carry freight for without a loss—how do we know and how can we tell what would be the condition of freight rates in this country with boats on our rivers and with intercoastal shipments if we had a policy in this country which made it impossible for the railroads to destroy this water competition? Have we gotten value received for the things we lost?

It is an elementary proposition that if the railroads are to make a reasonable return upon the property invested for the public account—and where there is water competition the railroads lose money—the interior must make up the deficit.

The next question is, Can the railroads meet the requirements of rail transportation and be denied the privilege of destroying water competition?

There has been no relief from the provisions of the fourth section since March, 1918. The roads are prospering as they have not prospered in the last decade. The question is, what tonnage could be taken from the roads by these water facilities, and to what extent would the taking of such tonnage render them less capable of carrying the interior tonnage?

My answer to that question is included in the first question. If they are carrying that tonnage to meet water competition at a loss, does it not follow that if they were to lose that tonnage, and it were carried by water, necessarily they would not sustain that loss, and, adjusting their business to the territory over which they have a monopoly, the amount released to the boats would react in an equitable adjustment of the interior rates to where the full amount they now receive could be received, for the reason that every ton of freight originating in America and exported abroad, and every ton originating abroad and imported into America, has to be handled by the railroads in the last analysis. Therefore it is a question as to whether we are going to allow the great transcontinental lines to carry the tonnage across the continent at water rates and recoup themselves on the local intermediate shipments, or whether we are going to confine them to the carriage by land and leave the question of adequate transportation to the dual system of land and water.

There is one other phase of this question. The argument has been made here that we have no boats on the rivers, that we have no intercoastal shipping. The reason we have no boats on the rivers is apparent to every intelligent man on this floor. Under the very first interpretation of section 4 of the act of 1877, the roads were given the power, under what perhaps was a loosely constructed verbiage in that act, but whose intent was clear, to meet water competition, and rail transportation being more expeditious and being safer than water transportation, necessarily, at the same rate, a shipper would prefer the railroad.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] yesterday called attention to that fact. He said the roads were more expeditious, they were safer, and therefore the shipper preferred to ship by them. I contend that if railroad transportation is the more expeditious and is safer, costing more, the shipper should pay more for that kind of freight transportation than for transportation by the means with the greater risk. In other words, if the railroads cost more and are more expeditious and give a better advantage to the shipper, by the same token he should be willing to pay more for the transportation that gives him an advantage over the less expeditious and less safe route. He should at least have the choice between the two. He has not that choice now.

My position in reference to this fourth section is this, that we should so word the act that there could be no mistake, and we could do that by providing that no rail carrier should be allowed to charge less for the long haul than for the shorter haul, if that smaller charge was for the purpose of meeting or destroying water competition.

I think the time has arrived when, without complicating our railroad problem, but trying to amend the fourth section of the act so that it might affect this delicate thing called the rate structure, we should go on record with the statement that we intend to try by an equitable adjustment to see whether or not we can build up our water facilities. The only way that can be done, Mr. President, is by declaring by statutory enactment that it is the policy of this country that we do not intend that the rail facilities of the country shall crowd out the water facilities and recoup the losses sustained in that crowding out by an extra charge on the interior points.

Mr. OVERMAN. What does the Senator say about discrimination in favor of one town against another in order to build up the one town to the detriment of the other town in the interior?

Mr. SMITH. That is a very serious matter, but there are in this rate structure conditions that must be met that render it perhaps one of the most delicate and scientific things that meet organized society. We have to meet conditions in the interior by what is popularly known as zoning if we are going to give the people of a given community an equal chance to a market which has been built up by virtue of fortunate position and circumstance. The great Middle West wants and should have access to the eastern, western, and northern markets on as even terms as it is possible to grant, without detriment to them or to other communities. That is the reason why I made the general statement that I do not believe that we have the right as representatives of the people to so frame legislation that the roads of the country can destroy water competition and not give the American people the opportunity of knowing whether we can not utilize both of them to their fullest efficiency.

It goes without saying that under the present form of the amended fourth section, where the wording is such as it is, that the railroads are now clamoring for relief from the fourth section, not for the purpose of regulating their interior freights but for the purpose of meeting and holding and maintaining tonnage that is rapidly drifting through the Panama Canal. I state that if the people of America can be served efficiently by the operation of that canal and by the operation of our intercoastal shipping they are entitled to have a chance at it. I state it as a sound fundamental principle that the railroads of the country should be denied the power to meet water competition at a lower rate than the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed as a reasonable rate in order to meet that competition, upon the untenable position that if denied that tonnage they would be unable to meet the out-of-pocket cost and therefore would be unable to serve the interior as efficiently as they are now serving it.

I wish to address myself particularly to the object that I individually have toward the law, that we should allow no railroad to charge less at a water-competing point than the maximum charge to any intermediate point and restrict it to where it meets water competition, and establish that as our policy. Then we might invite investment in river and coastwise and intercanal shipping. We can not have it now for the reason that bitter experience since the passage of the interstate commerce act has demonstrated that in spite of three amendments to the fourth section, the decisions of the commission and the courts have been such that they were enabled to meet the competition and destroy the traffic on our rivers and on our coastal waters. Therefore, what I am pleading for is not with any particular reference to the construction of the rate structure in reference to the relation of the roads each to each other.

Considering the figures I have submitted and the startling fact that within the last 13 years we have not added practically a mile of road and have doubled the investment in the railroads that we already have, and remembering the cry coming from every quarter of the country that our transportation system has broken down, and that we have a great water system bisecting our country from north to south and our whole continent encircled with magnificent harbors and facilities for export trade, I claim that now, while this amendment is pending, we should so word it as to make available the millions of dollars that were put into our river and harbor improvements, and invite capital to invest in our water carriers and pledge to them that we will not allow the railroads of the country to destroy water competition, discriminate against interior places in favor of coastal places, and upset the balance and destroy the hopes of those who have a right to enjoy not only our water facilities, but our railroad facilities. They should be so correlated that each should serve in its sphere to its fullest capacity without relation to the welfare of the earnings of the other in so far as they serve within their sphere.

I know it is a hard matter to eliminate the feeling of section, and the feeling that perhaps, under certain conditions, my neighborhood may be benefited more under an unjust system than under a just one. But it is my duty to stand here and declare what is my conviction as to the problem that confronts us. I believe that by denying the railroads the right to destroy water competition, by encouraging the utilization of our water facilities, we will, with a minimum of cost, furnish adequate transportation for the needs of America and meet at every step its advancement and expansion and its progress in the development of its facilities.

Mr. President, I do not think that it is a question before us as to whether or not our railroads have a right to demand so and so. It is simply a question of what the development of the country and the needs of the country demand. They demand adequate transportation facilities at the lowest reasonable cost. Transportation is as essential to the development and welfare of America as is the financial system. We lay our hands upon our banking and currency and regulate it under certain rules, and we are attempting to do it to meet the needs of all those who produce and all those who transform that production. It is therefore essential for us to meet the problem not in the sense of favoring the railroads or favoring water transportation but to solve the problem as to whether or not they both are engaged in the transportation problem, and adjust our laws so as to see that each shall develop in its own sphere for the benefit of the people.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. It is not possible, is it, for the railroads to destroy water competition unless they are allowed to do so by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SMITH. No; that is true.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator think the Interstate Commerce Commission is deliberately exercising its discretion in such a way as to permit the railroads to destroy water competition?

Mr. SMITH. No. I answer the Senator frankly. I agree with him that these gentlemen are trying as best they may to carry out the intent of Congress, but when a case is taken to the courts and the Supreme Court of the country decide that the language of a certain statute is such as to grant the privilege asked by the complainant their hands are tied, like the Senator's and mine would be.

Mr. BRUCE. But is not the thing to do under those circumstances to take another case to the Supreme Court of the United States and have the Supreme Court say that the construction placed on the amendment by the Interstate Commerce Commission is erroneous?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no. I am talking about the carrier ultimately taking the case to the Supreme Court, as they have done under practically every amendment that has been passed to the fourth section and the position of the commission denied or reversed by virtue of the decision of the court. I do not believe under the language of the present law that the railroads in a test case under certain conditions could be denied relief by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BRUCE. Let me ask the Senator another question. I am seeking light. It is only for that reason that I ask the question. Suppose Congress were to provide that the railroads were never to charge rates to the Pacific coast that were below a level of, say, 6 per cent higher than the existing water rate. Would that meet the situation?

Mr. SMITH. No. Let me put my case clearly.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask the question of the Senator, who is an old, experienced member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I would like to know the Senator's view.

Mr. SMITH. My position is that the railroads shall not charge for the longer distance any less than the average remunerative price received from the highest charge on the intermediate haul, or, to put it in another way, that they shall not charge less than the aggregate charges on the intermediate freight on that line to meet water competition.

Mr. BRUCE. Then the Senator would make it impossible, as I see it, for the railroads to obtain any share of the business at San Francisco or Portland at all. It is only by allowing them to have lower rates at those points that they can participate in the business of those ports in competition with the water lines at all. The effect of the Senator's suggestion would be to cut off the communities in the eastern portions of the United States from doing any business with the Pacific coast at all by rail. The only thing they could do, of course, would be to resort to the water line between the eastern seaboard of the United States and the western seaboard of the United States; and, of course, that might be a very unfortunate necessity to them where the communities were situated in the northern portion, we will say, of the central and eastern part of the United States. The effect of the Senator's suggestion is to cut off shippers in the eastern part of the United States from shipping goods to the Pacific coast, as they would do under different conditions.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have not the table before me, but it has been suggested that less than 2 per cent is handled by the railroads. That, however, if the Senator from Nevada will allow me, does not concern me, for this reason: If an adequate transportation system can be built up from the East to the West by the water route, it is our duty to ascertain that fact and to establish such a system.

Mr. BRUCE. But I was asking the Senator particularly whether he does not think—and I am asking the question from curiosity—the situation might be met by having a sliding differential scale that would always preserve a certain ratio between the rates of water lines on the Pacific Ocean and the rates of the railroad lines leading to the Pacific coast?

Mr. SMITH. The situation might be so met after we should have built up our boat facilities.

Mr. BRUCE. I should like to know what the Senator from Nevada thinks about it.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the sliding scale accomplishes what the railroads want—that is, if it gives them what they call their proportionate share of the traffic now carried by water—then the sliding scale will be just as destructive as the Senator from South Carolina is complaining that it would be; and if the sliding scale does not give the railroads that, they do not want the sliding scale.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not see that. Their professed object, of course, is simply to get their fair share of the Pacific coast traffic.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, I say, if they do not get their fair share with the rate that is allowed, they do not get anything. If they do get what they call their fair share, they get half; and if they get half, the same rate that would allow them to get half would not stop them at getting half.

Mr. BRUCE. No matter what they would get, however, the profit would be a contribution, of course, toward the general administration expenses of the railroads and for that reason would inure to the benefit of intermediate points on transcontinental lines.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, just on that point, will the Senator from South Carolina pardon a further interruption?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is not any doubt but what there would be freight shipped by transcontinental railroads if this amendment should go into effect, because the able Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] yesterday disclosed the fact that the railroad is the more expeditious and safe means of shipment. There is not any doubt but what all freight which is required to be expedited would go by rail. We have had railroad men testifying before the committee, and they all know that is the fact. As a matter of fact, if they should be given half of the transportation going through the Panama Canal which they seek and which would put half of the boats off, it would mean only 2 per cent, mind you, of the business that the western railroads are doing. It would mean that they would be doing that 2 per cent without profit, so far as earning above out-of-pocket costs is concerned. For the benefit of carrying 2 per cent more freight at an out-of-pocket cost they are willing to destroy at least half of the coastwise shipping going through the Panama Canal. That is all there is to that.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not admit that, of course.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Maryland to understand my position thoroughly. We know that we now have no water transportation, and we know that so long as the railroads are allowed to meet the water competition we are not going to have any. We know that the level of freight rates to interior points will always be kept up so as to absorb the loss which is sustained by virtue of meeting the water competition. In the inception of the railroad business of this country we gave millions upon millions of acres of land in the development and building up of the great transcontinental lines. By the same token now we should address ourselves to a policy that would for a sufficient number of years give the water carriers an opportunity at least to test whether or not with their equipment they can aid in meeting the needs of transportation.

Mr. President, I do not think that this subject is one of local or sectional interest. It is a problem that affects all the American people; it is one that has invited the thought of the best students of economics in the world. I do not believe, however, that there is another civilized country in the world that has paid so little attention to or has derived so little advantage from the magnificent water facilities and the capacity for service that the water routes and our coast offer to the American people.

I am not an advocate of Government ownership. I do not believe that after we have arrived at the present stage of tremendous investment in the railroads we shall probably have in the next generation or so any serious attempt for the Government to take over the railroads; but I do believe that the Government should so adjust and correlate these rates and the relation of water transportation to the railroads that we may have the benefit of both.

It is not a question on whom the burden falls, as has been discussed on this floor; it is a question of relieving the burden. Let us here adjudicate and distribute that burden as in our judgment is right. I hope this amendment shall be so amended as to apply to competition with water and deny beyond any peradventure the right of court or commission to say that the rail carriers of this country can, for the purpose of destroying competition, fix a rate that does destroy that competition.

Mr. President, just a glance at the map on the wall and then I am through. From the mouth of the Mississippi River up to the Great Lakes we have had provided by nature and by providence a transportation system which, if developed, would meet the needs of a vast area of our inland territory. By the development of the St. Lawrence Canal we would open a gateway for this great section of the country [indicating on the map] to the ocean, and from our eastern seaboard, with its ports and facilities, clear around the Gulf of Mexico and through the Panama Canal we have the whole continent encircled with the possibility of transportation to relieve any congestion on the rails and give them the added opportunity to develop normally and naturally to meet the normal and natural requirements of their territory, without invading the province of nature's gift to the American people in the possibilities of water transportation.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Fess	Ladd	Sheppard
Ashurst	Fletcher	Lodge	Shipstead
Ball	Frazier	McKellar	Shortridge
Bayard	George	McKinley	Simmons
Borah	Gerry	McLean	Smith
Brandegee	Glass	McNary	Smoot
Brookhart	Gooding	Mayfield	Spencer
Broussard	Hale	Moses	Stanfield
Bruce	Harris	Neely	Stephens
Bursum	Harrison	Norris	Swanson
Cameron	Heflin	Oddie	Trammell
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	Overman	Underwood
Caraway	Johnson, Minn.	Owen	Wadsworth
Copeland	Jones, N. Mex.	Pepper	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Warren
Curtis	Kendrick	Ransdell	Watson
Dale	Keyes	Reed, Pa.	Wheeler
Dill	King	Robinson	Willis

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I feel that I should state at this time the reason why the long and short haul amendment will be offered to the Army appropriation bill. It is for this reason:

The Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate has been having hearings now for something over four months. For something like 30 days the Senate was delayed in electing a chairman of that committee. I understand that it is the first time in the history of Congress that a member of a minority party has been elected chairman of a great committee of the Senate. We have reported out at least one measure of very great importance to agriculture, and the long and short haul measure is important to the whole country. Other measures of great importance are under consideration, and some of them have been reported to the Senate.

I think we are all aware that for some time there has been in this country a propaganda that no railroad legislation should be passed at this session. Large sums have been spent by the railroads in this propaganda work. From the fact that two long and short haul bills were introduced in the House on the 10th of December, soon after Congress convened, and many other railroad measures, and no hearing has been had on any of them that can be considered as important legislation, it is generally admitted that there is no opportunity for this legislation to come out of the House, although I hope I am mistaken in this.

The time seems to have arrived in this country when the people can not have a hearing on a petition or important proposed legislation because the great railroad corporations of this country, through a propaganda, seem at this time to wield what I believe is a dangerous influence from the standpoint of legislation and good government.

It was for that reason that the friends of this measure took an unusual course. I agree very thoroughly that legislation of this kind should not be placed on a great appropriation bill. I am quite sure that under normal conditions that policy is right; but to-day there are unusual conditions. When the people are denied the right of a hearing, which everybody admits is un-American, then the friends of the measure who want legislation must proceed along unusual lines, too. That is the reason why the amendment carrying the long and short haul bill will be offered to the Army bill; and I want to say to the Republican Party, to my party, that if it is going to be its policy to the end, until Congress adjourns, that no thought or consideration or hearing shall be given to legislation along railroad lines before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce, those who are directing the affairs of the Republican Party had better get the wrecking crew ready to gather up the fragments of the Republican Party after the November elections.

If there comes a time when the American people can not have measures in which they are interested presented to a committee that is organized for that purpose, we shall have about reached the end of a government of the people. That is the reason why we are appealing to those who think the people should have relief from discrimination in freight rates, that we may attach it to this important measure with the hope that when it comes back from the House it will come back approved.

Mr. President, I am going to take up a little more time now in discussing these discriminations. It is possible that I have not made myself altogether clear. Freight rates are hard to understand, so I have worked them out a little more fully.

Take the case of a 40,000-pound carload of dry goods going from Chicago to Scranton, Iowa, a distance of 376 miles. The rate is $1.11. The car earns for the railroad $444. It earns for each mile from Chicago to Scranton $1.18. If the proposed rate is put in to Seattle—the distance from Chicago to Seattle is 2,445 miles, and the proposed rate is $1.10 a hundred, a cent less than it is at Scranton—the car will earn $440 for a haul of 2,445 miles, but it will be hauled each mile from Chicago to Seattle for 18 cents a mile, as compared with $1.18 for the people of Scranton.

I am sorry the Senators from Arkansas are not in the Chamber. Here is a very interesting violation.

On a 40,000-pound carload of dry goods going from Chicago to Pine Bluff, Ark., a distance of 677 miles, the rate is $1.99½ a hundred. The car earns for the railroad $789. The car-mile rate is $1.18 a mile. From New Orleans the distance to Chicago is 912 miles, 235 miles longer than to Pine Bluff, Ark. The rate is $1.53½ a hundred. The car earns for the railroad $614. The car-mile rate is 67 cents a hundred, as compared to $1.18 that the people of Pine Bluff, Ark., must pay.

If the proposed rate of $1.10 from Chicago to San Francisco were put in, the car passing through Pine Bluff, Ark., would pay only 12 cents per car mile, as against $1.18 that the people of Pine Bluff would pay for their dry goods.

Mr. President, I have here a resolution passed by the State railroad commissions of the United States. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read. This resolution was passed unanimously on two occasions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Resolution adopted by National Associaton of Railway Commissioners in convention at Atlanta, Ga., in 1921, and readopted in convention at Miami, Fla., in 1923

Resolved, That Congress is hereby respectfully urged to amend section 4 of the interstate commerce act as amended by striking out all of the first proviso therein, which reads as follows:

"Provided, That upon application to the commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section; but in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from the more distant point that is not reasonably compensatory for the service performed; and if a circuitous line or route is, because of such circuity, granted authority to meet the charges of a more direct line or route to or from competitive points and to maintain higher charges to or from intermediate points on its line, the authority shall not include intermediate points as to which the haul of the petitioning line or route is not longer than that of the direct line or route between the competitive points; and no such authorization shall be granted on account of merely potential water competition not actually in existence."

At Miami, Fla., the 1923 convention adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we affirm the resolution passed by this association at the Atlanta convention, October 11 to 14, 1921, as to amendment of the fourth section of the interstate commerce act relating to long and short haul rates."

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I want to refer again, on the map on the wall, to the Monongahela River. I find that the statement I made in my remarks a day or two ago, that the river carried something like 18,000,000 tons last year, was somewhat in error. I find that the river carried 23,000,000 tons, and that passing up and down that river were 15 different commodities, of which 18,709,000 tons were coal, 2,100,000 tons were cement, and there were 700,000 tons of iron and steel products.

To handle this 23,000,000 tons carried on the Monongahela River it would require 589,000 cars of 80,000 pounds each, which if placed in trains three-quarters of a mile long, containing 75 cars each, would require 7,852 trains, or 21 trains of 75 cars each for every day in the year.

On the Allegheny River there were carried 4,612,640 tons of freight, which would require 115,316 cars of 80,000 pounds each, and would require 1,537 trains of 75 cars each, or 4 trains a day, for each day in the year, including Sundays, to haul this freight.

Passing up and down the Ohio there were 7,286,005 tons of freight, equivalent to 182,150 cars of 80,000 pounds each, and 2,428 trains of 75 cars each, requiring nearly 7 trains a day for each day in the year.

Altogether, on these three rivers, there were 35,458,669 tons of freight, equal to 886,466 cars of 80,000 pounds each, and equal to 11,819 trains of 75 cars each, and it would require 32 trains, with at least two locomotives, each day, including Sundays, to handle this enormous tonnage.

The Government is paying for the operation of the locks on those rivers. The Government paid for all the construction. No toll is paid for the use of those rivers. The larger part of the coal is carried direct to the steel mills in Pittsburgh. I am discussing this because I want the Senate to understand what river improvement means. Fortunately, of course, for this improvement and this development, there is no violation of the fourth section. With violations of the fourth section we can not have any improvements on our rivers and we can not develop the electric power on our rivers. So for that reason, Mr. President, if this country is to continue to develop, is to continue its onward march of progress—and we have just made a beginning—then we must make use of our great inland waterways.

It is strange, it seems to me, that the people of Pittsburgh should have the Government operating their locks and building all the improvements necessary, while the people of the West are forced, through a Government agency, to pay an increased price in freight rates in order that the Government itself may destroy water transportation in some other part of the country. It is not strange, after all, when we realize the tremendous influence the Steel Corporation has in this country. We have a "Pittsburgh plus" in freight in this country, under which every farmer and every man who buys steel, even if he buys it as far west as Pueblo, must pay the freight rate on steel from Pittsburgh to the place where he uses it. He may go to the steel mills at Pueblo, Colo., and buy a thousand pounds of steel of any kind, but he pays the freight on it from Pittsburgh. It is said that the farmers of this country are paying $50,000,000 a year of an increase in freight rates on manufactures of iron and steel brought about by the "Pittsburgh plus" policy, yet when you get down into the agricultural country, where we might develop manufacturing institutions and our natural resources, we find a freight rate that is discriminatory and under which we pay in many cases as high as 900 per cent more than others pay on a mileage basis and a higher rate than others pay for a haul a thousand miles longer.

Mr. President, this discrimination in freight rates is un-American. We thought we settled that policy in the Revolutionary War. We did not go to war with England over the tea party in Boston Harbor alone. For more than a hundred years the English Government had denied the people of the Colonies an opportunity to develop their natural resources. They were not permitted to mold a plowshare; they were not permitted to manufacture a horseshoe nail.

They were only permitted to produce the raw material which the British Government forced them to ship to England to be manufactured into the finished product. The Colonies knew and understood that a country that could not manufacture its raw materials into the finished product must always remain agricultural and pastoral. It was for those great principles that we fought the Revolutionary War—that we might develop industries in this country, produce the finished product, and be a factor with all other nations in the markets of the world.

The development of the mighty resources of this country into the finished product has built up the greatest industries in America the world has ever known, and yet in the development of our mighty resources we have only made a beginning in this country if we make it possible to develop adequate transportation upon our inland waterways and coastwise shipping.

The West is making a fight against the discriminatory freight rates that have been forced upon us for many years, and unless we can eliminate this discrimination the interior States of the West must always remain agricultural and pastoral, for capital will never invest in any industry or in any part of the country where there is discrimination in freight rates. It is so unjust and un-American that it should be settled for all time, and this Government should adopt a policy that will permit every section of this great country to take part in the growth and development that will come to us with a spirit of fairness in transportation for the whole country.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2169) to amend in certain particulars the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. McKENZIE, Mr. HULL of Iowa, and Mr. QUIN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 47 to the bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, in this morning's issue of the Washington Post I notice a statement that there is a loophole in the immigration bill, or, as it is called in another part of the same article, a "joker," which will allow the admission of an indefinite number of Asiatics regardless of the exclusion clause.

I only rise to say that the clause in question was in the bill as it passed the House and was in the bill as it passed the Senate, in exactly the same words. It was not in conference and is not some artifice of the conferees, but is a clause upon which both Houses were in agreement.

What it does is to permit the entry as nonimmigrants of persons who under treaties of trade and navigation are permitted to enter the United States. The same privilege has been extended for a hundred years past. There is nothing new whatever in this provision of the bill. The same exception existed under the quota law of 1921. The same exception has always been recognized in the Chinese exclusion law and the Chinese exclusion treaty, and it never occurred to anybody, except the Washington Post of this morning, to consider it a joker.

It is a mere recognition of the trade privileges which they give us and we give them, and we actually went so far in this new immigration law as to require for the first time that those persons might be compelled to give bond to insure their departure when their treaty business was finished, something that has never been done before in the history of this country.

Mr. DILL. I take it the Senator does not think that the interpretation placed on the treaty in the Washington Post story this morning is correct?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am perfectly certain it is not.

Mr. DILL. And there is nothing in that treaty which gives them any such rights as are suggested?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We have treaties of trade with practically every civilized nation in the world. Our treaties provide that their ships may come to our ports, and of course they have to bring human beings with them when they come. They give us the same privileges in their ports. Then we have treaties with every nation that their nationals may come here or their merchants may come here for the purpose of trade.

Mr. DILL. Japan has never relied upon that as a means of getting her people into this country?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Never; nor has China; nor has Great Britain used it for bringing Asiatics here from her Asiatic possessions. I am perfectly sure there is nothing whatever in the suggestion, and I am making this statement only to allay, if I can, any possible doubt that may have been raised by the article.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47 to the bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

REED SMOOT,
CHARLES CURTIS,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
FRANK MURPHY,
C. D. CARTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate still further insist on its amendment to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment numbered 47 to House bill 5078, and ask for a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. HARRIS conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

THE NARCOTIC PROBLEM

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit for the RECORD and have printed a "Survey of the narcotic problem," by Commissioner Simon, of New York, in connection with which I desire to make some remarks later, especially as to the use of heroin in the United States.

There being no objection, the survey was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SURVEY OF THE NARCOTIC PROBLEM

[By Carleton Simon, M. D., special deputy police commissioner in charge narcotic division of the New York City police department, before the Medical Society of the County of New York, January 28, 1924, at New York Academy of Medicine]

Of late years there has been considerable controversy as to whether narcotic drug addiction should be viewed as a medical question or as a police problem. We may go on forever debating the question academically, but why not have the facts?

This latter is exactly what I have undertaken to get. Instead of relying on estimates based upon hearsay and exaggeration I have gathered exact statistics.

In June, 1923, questionnaires were sent to all the physicians and dentists in the State of New York.

The one to the physicians asked:

Amount of morphine prescribed in 1922.

Amount of heroin prescribed in 1922.

Amount of cocaine prescribed in 1922.

Number of narcotic addicts treated in 1922.

Do you believe heroin necessary in your practice?

Do you believe cocaine can be advantageously replaced by nonhabit-forming synthetic drugs, such as novocain or similar preparations?

The one to the dentists contained the following inquiries:

Amount of cocaine used in 1922.

Do you believe cocaine can be advantageously replaced by nonhabit-forming synthetic drugs, such as novocain or similar preparations?

The animating purpose in making these inquiries of physicians and dentists as to the practical experience acquired in their professional use of habit-forming drugs were:

1. To determine whether narcotic drug addiction is a medical issue or a police problem, or both.

2. To gain statistical knowledge as to the number of medical drug addicts treated in this State during a given period of time, from which reasonable approximations or conclusions may be drawn.

3. To ascertain the quantity of narcotics prescribed by the physicians and dentists in the State of New York.

No attempt was made to ascertain the amount of narcotics consumed by the public and furnished to the market legitimately through druggists in the form of paregoric, proprietary medicines, etc., nor were hospitals taken into consideration. It was my opinion that addicts treated in hospitals had previously been under treatement in the private practice of physicians. Therefore, in order to avoid duplication, no hospital statistics were gathered.

4. To obtain general information as to the desirability and possibility of the practitioner substituting nonhabit-forming drugs, without lessened efficacy of his service to his patients.

5. To secure information as to the necessity of heroin in the practice of medicine.

There was no intention to suggest any restrictions to the constitutional right of the physician to prescribe whatever he deemed necessary to his practice. In the light of the investigations here reported and which may hereafter be made, the profession itself should determine whether the physicians themselves should not unite in declaring heroin an outlawed drug.

6. To ascertain the quantity of cocaine used by dentists and physicians; to determine the percentage of practitioners who, in part or wholly, employ synthetic preparations having no habit-forming qualities, and to learn from those competent to judge, the efficacy of these substitutes.

It was my intention to find out what narcotics are necessary and the extent of their use and in general to show, through the census, the general trend.

Far from attempting to minimize the work of the practitioner, my aim has been to gather information so that the various viewpoints of the physicians and dentists may be available for mitigating and eradicating evils in connection with the use of habit-forming drugs.

The responses to this appeal from the medical and dental profession have been most hearty, and again furnish exhaustive evidence that the professional man is an altruist in lending his aid in the solution of great public issues. It is to be hoped that the data secured will be helpful in solving some of the vexatious problems that obtrude. A review of the returns received from the questionnaire shows as follows:

IS DRUG ADDICTION A MEDICAL ISSUE OR A POLICE PROBLEM?

Some medical men have been of the opinion that all that pertains to this subject should be under the jurisdiction of the medical profession; that drug addiction is a sickness or a disease, and the addict should be regarded and treated as a sick man.

On the other hand, most of those administering the criminal laws, supported by the great majority of social workers, contend that because such a large percentage of criminals have acquired the narcotic habit, the issue has become one that is inseparably connected with the regulation of crime.

The returns show that there is a medical narcotic addict who requires narcotics because of physical ailments. This type is obviously one to be handled by physicians, and every barrier should be removed so as not to embarrass the physician in according relief to such sufferers.

The far greater number, however, are the criminal drug addicts, whose addiction in its inception and in its continuance is due to vice, vicious environment, and criminal associations. The consideration of this class, the figures prove, constitutes a distinct police problem. The so-called medical addict, who will not consult the physician but purchases his narcotics from street vendors, and thus supports the illicit traffic in drugs, obviously places himself in the same class with the criminal addict. In about 10,000 arrests and hospital commitments for cure by the narcotic division of the police department during the past three years, 98 per cent and a fraction frankly admitted that their addiction was due to bad associations; that there was never any medical reason for their using narcotics. The remaining 2 per cent gave various excuses for first using narcotics, principally some surgical operation or illness. At the time of their arrest there was in this minute percentage almost invariably no reason for their continuing to use narcotics; surely there was no excuse for the use of heroin and cocaine. They buy these on the street, knowing that no reputable doctor will prescribe for them. The medical addict usually confines himself to morphine, but the menu of the criminal addict is heroin and cocaine. Approximately 95 per cent of those arrested by the police in New York City are heroin and cocaine users. In other parts of the country morphine is the chief narcotic.

Heroin addiction is, however, rapidly replacing morphine addiction throughout the United States, this spread being more noticeable in the seaport cities and from them.

To those addicted to the use of an opium derivative, morphine or heroin is considered a daily necessity. Cocaine does not entail suffering if withdrawn. Heroin is preferred because of its greater potency, and because of its smaller bulk per weight it is more easily smuggled.

NUMBER OF ADDICTS UNDER TREATMENT

It has been asserted that the arrests of the police department represent but 10 per cent of the narcotic addicts in this State; that the greater number of addicts are being treated by the physicians as private patients. I have always taken the opposite position, and controverted the criticism directed at the medical profession.

This census of the physicians of this State shows that the percentage of medical addicts is almost negligible.

Those who dispute the police point of view, that narcotic drug addiction is an underworld problem, maintain that there is a very large number of addicts with whom the police never come in contact. They contend that the larger number and better class of addicts are treated by physicians. The replies to this questionnaire definitely settle this point.

Further analysis of the answers received to the questionnaire shows as in Table 2:

A total of 389 physicians treated a grand total of addicts	775

NINETY-FOUR AND EIGHT-TENTHS PER CENT OR 7,179 PHYSICIANS DID NOT TREAT ANY ADDICTS

It was my desire to make an accurate survey of the medical situation, as I felt that the physician had been stigmatized by the popular idea that he was the cause of the growth of narcotic drug addiction in this country.

Some of the addicts included in the above total of 775 treated by physicians were not what might strictly be called "medical" addicts; that is, their addiction was traceable in its acquirement to some ailment, or they were suffering from some diseased condition that required narcotics. Furthermore, most of the cases reported were of patients under treatment for cancer or other painful disease or of very old people. No question was asked as to the ages of addicts, but some physicians furnished additional information, as the following examples show:

One physician treated 7 addicts, all old people.

One physician treated 8 addicts, all over 60 years.

One physician treated 8 addicts, ages of 63 to 76.

One physician treated 11 addicts, all over 50, most past 70, one 87.

One physician treated 16 addicts, all suffering from some chronic disease, one under 40, 3 under 30, others between 50 and 75.

The haunting specter of narcotism has been exaggerated to propaganda, no doubt well meaning but nevertheless misleading. It is my desire to clear away the mist that enshrouds this subject and not to overestimate nor belittle its import.

When we look for figures as to the number of narcotic users in the country or in any section or spot therein we are given the choice of a wide variety of guesses from many official sources. For New York City these estimates run as high as 250,000.

The United States Public Health Service in a bulletin issued in 1915 gave 140,000 as its highest estimate of the number of drug addicts in this country. Four years later, 1919, the congressional committee appointed to investigate this problem stated that the number of drug addicts in the United States exceeded 1,000,000, or 2 per cent of the population, 4 per cent of the adults. These are Government figures. In addition the committee viewed the situation with alarm and reported that drug addiction was increasing; that there was a nation-wide use of narcotics and that it was being used by all classes.

I believe that these figures are inexact but am convinced that the prevalence of narcotic drug addiction in the underworld is nevertheless appalling.

To even more definitely show the criminality associated with drug addiction and the extent to which it has grown in the ranks of the criminal I have selected, from the arrest statistics of the narcotic division of the police department of the city of New York for 1923, a group of 741 individuals whose records showed more than five previous convictions, which are summarized in Table 3:

TABLE 3.—Criminality and narcotic addiction

	Previous arrests for various crimes	Total
1 individual's record showed	25	25

On carefully checking up our statistics of arrests and commitments to hospitals of narcotic users for the years 1921, 1922, and 1923, totaling 9,637 in number, I found that they represent 8,174 individual narcotic users. I then checked up the criminal records of these 8,174 persons, and, so far as shown by records on file in the international identification bureau of narcotic criminals, of the New York police department, representing 700 cities and 27 nations, these 8,174 individuals had been previously arrested 32,696 times in all sections of the country for every crime on the calendar.

The 8,174 narcotic users were tabulated as follows:

Eight hundred and seventy-six opium smokers (mostly Chinese).

Twenty-seven hasheesh users (marahuanne smokers).

Three hundred and seventy-nine use morphine only.

Six thousand eight hundred and ninety-two use heroin separately or combined with cocaine.

It will be noted that eliminating the smokers of opium and hasheesh, 95 per cent of the narcotic addicts use heroin. Only 2 per cent trace their addiction to medical reasons.

These figures are exact as far as criminal records were available, and are extremely illuminating on the great problems confronting the police. They permit us also to arrive at the definite conclusion that the number of drug addicts in the State of New York—estimates running to half a million individuals—has been grossly exaggerated.

We know there are drug addicts among the wealthy, in society, on the stage, and in the professional ranks, but their number has also been greatly overestimated. Some of these have also been arrested by the police. The source of supply of the drugs in these instances is the same—the smuggler and the street vendor.

PRESCRIBING OF NARCOTICS

As to the quantity of narcotics used and prescribed by physicians and dentists in the State of New York as an index to the legitimate demand per capita, replies to the questionnaires give the following:

AMOUNT OF MORPHINE AND HEROIN PRESCRIBED IN 1922 BY 7,559, OR 51.37 PER CENT, OF THE PHYSICIANS OF THIS STATE

Morphine: 1,392 ounces, or 43,291 grams.

Heroin: 30 ounces, or 922 grams.

The basis of 1,392 ounces, or 43,291.2 grams, of morphine used by 7,559 physicians establishes an average of 5.727 grams of morphine per physician, which, when applied to 14,715 physicians in the entire State, gives a total of 2,709.7 ounces, or 84,272 grams, of morphine prescribed by the physicians of this State during the year 1922.

On this basis also, of 30 ounces, or 933 grams of heroin prescribed by 7,559 physicians, would give an average of 0.1234 gram per physician, which, when applied to 14,715 physicians in the entire State, gives a total of 58.38 ounces, or 1,815.83 grams, of heroin prescribed by the physicians of this State during the year 1922.

Of the physicians who answered the question, 5,362 stated they did not prescribe any heroin in 1922.

IS HEROIN NECESSARY

To the question, "Do you believe heroin necessary in your practice?" the replies were divided as follows:

No, 5,715. Yes, 1,201. Occasional, 404. Unanswered, 239.

Under occasional use we have grouped a variety of replies which may be best expressed by that word. Most of those prescribing heroin believed it to possess special qualities useful in the treatment of bronchial conditions. Of the large percentage of practitioners answering this inquiry approximately 80 per cent deemed heroin a needless addition to their therapeutic armamentarium.

While so small a quantity of heroin was legitimately used by physicians in this State, more heroin is used by the criminal narcotic addicts in New York City than all other narcotic drugs combined. Ninety-five per cent of the criminal drug addicts arrested in New York City use heroin regularly, adding cocaine occasionally or whenever they can get it, and resorting to morphine only when they can not get heroin. Placing the customers of the illicit narcotic street vendors in New York City at a minimum of 10,000, based upon arrest statistics, using at the average of 10 grains per day, we have 100,000 grains daily or 36,500,000 grains or 76,041 ounces as the yearly quantity of heroin used by the criminal drug addict in New York City alone, against 58 ounces computed as being legitimately prescribed by the entire medical profession of the State. That is why I am seeking light on the subject, trying to find a way to shut off this flow, at the same time respecting the rights of the physician to prescribe.

These replies show that the majority of the addiction cases treated by the physicians are purely medical cases; that these patients require narcotics and are exempt under the Harrison Drug Act or are being treated by the physicians in good faith for their cure and not addicts being supplied for their comfort.

As previously noted, this State census shows that these answers represent 51.37 per cent of the physicians of the entire State of New York who have treated 775 medical addicts in one year.

From these replies I arrive at the conclusion that at this ratio the number of medical addicts in the State of New York is 1,509.

Thus it is definitely shown that the medical narcotic addicts whose number can be estimated and who require narcotics because of physical ailments is far in the minority in comparison with those whose numbers are ascertainable through arrest and whose activity is absolutely a police problem.

The questionnaire was sent out last June. Coincidentally, the Portuguese delegate to the advisory committee on traffic in opium of the League of Nations on June 5, 1923, proposed "that in view of the existing medical evidence, tending to show the possibility of completely doing away with the use of heroin in medical and surgical practice, that the committee recommended to request our Government to appoint a committee of inquiry with a view of ascertaining the possibility of completely abolishing the manufacturing of heroin and its use, and in the event of the committee of inquiry deciding that manufacturing of heroin could not be done away with entirely to inquire into its use being limited to certain types of cases, or in particular type of cases."

In the United States Army the use of heroin has been interdicted by order of the Surgeon General.

In the United States Public Health Service the use of heroin has been interdicted by the order of the Surgeon General.

In a large number of public hospitals the use of heroin has been interdicted by order of medical boards and superintendents.

The health commissioners of Chicago and of New York City simultaneously expressed themselves:

> "Stop the use of heroin in all hospitals. It serves no purpose that other agents can not accomplish as effectively and without the attendant possibility of disaster."

COCAINE AND ITS SUBSTITUTES

Many physicians and dentists in a desire to offset the dangers of cocaine to their patients and to avoid the entanglement and the annoyance connected with complying to the Harrison Drug Act have gradually substituted in their practice nonhabit-forming synthetic compounds having otherwise similar attributes to cocaine. Chief among these have been novocaine, also known in this country as procaine.

Another question was: "Do you believe cocaine can be advantageously replaced by nonhabit-forming drugs, such as novocaine or similar preparation?" The replies were as indicated in Table 4:

TABLE 4.—"Is cocaine replaceable?"

	Yes	No	Occasional	Unanswered
Physicians	5,158	1,280	534	587
Dentists	3,770	253	277	35

Another question which was asked of physicians and dentists was: "Amount of cocaine used in 1922?"

The cards returned by 7,559, or 51.37 per cent, of the physicians and 4,335, or 50.89 per cent, of the dentists showed the following:

Physicians: 610 ounces, or 18,971 grams.

Dentists: 1,716 ounces, or 53,368 grams.

An analysis of the replies received from physicians as to the need for cocaine and the possibility of substituting some nonhabit-forming synthetic product, such as novocain, shows that only approximately 17 per cent of those answering this question considered cocaine indispensable. The majority of this 17 per cent deemed cocaine necessary in the treatment of nose and throat lesions, and there were also some ophthalmologists and genito-urinary specialists who preferred cocaine where anesthesia of the eye membranes and of the urethrel tract is an essential to examination and treatment. Most of the practitioners of these three groups use cocaine topically only, rarely, if ever, prescribing it. Thus it will be noted that from these angles of medical practice the danger of cocaine habit forming is negligible. It will be further noted that about 83 per cent of the physicians answering the inquiry of this point expressed the belief that cocaine can be advantageously replaced by nonhabit-forming drugs, such as novocain or similar preparations.

Members of the dental profession were even more favorably inclined to substitute novocain and like products for cocaine, there being only 6 per cent of those answering who believed cocaine indispensible.

CONCLUSIONS

(1) The narcotic addict exists.

(2) His addiction is the result of physical or medical causes in only 2 per cent of all cases among the thousands observed by the police.

(3) In those few instances of true medical addiction treated by the medical profession in the State of New York for the year 1922 the great preponderance show that they were treated for disease and not for drug addiction.

(4) Because of the fact that addiction has its origin or is coupled with crime or with criminal environment in 98 per cent of the police cases, the problem is in the category of criminology and therefore comes within the province of the police.

(5) The quantity of the various habit-forming drugs purchased by physicians and by dentists is well within the needs of their patients. These legitimate amounts represent but an infinitesimal proportion of what is trafficked in through underground channels.

(6) Heroin has no specific uses in medicine in the opinion of approximately 80 per cent of the practitioners consulted.

(7) Cocaine is useful in medical practice as a topical anesthetic in various conditions of the eye, the nose, the throat, and the genito-urinary parts. Eighty-three per cent of the physicians and 94 per cent of the dentists, whose answers are to hand, are of the opinion that cocaine can be dispensed with in practice through the use of novocain or other nonhabit-forming synthetic compounds.

(8) Underworld addicts have a decided preference for heroin and cocaine.

(9) The international phase of this question is largely dependent upon what the laboratory is likely to accomplish in the near future in the preparation of habit-forming drugs synthetically and the education of the professions in the use and selection of nonhabit-forming substitutes. Sooner or later heroin, cocaine, and morphine will be possible of manufacture universally at a far less cost than that which now obtains through growth and treatment of the plants from which they are derived. When that time comes supply and demand can be regulated in conformity with economic conditions, plus international agreement as to traffic in these drugs.

(10) The sharp distinction between the medical addict and the underworld addict will clear up many of the problems confronting the medical profession and the law-enforcing agencies. This will also destroy many ramifications of the leakage from legitimate sources to the underground criminal strata. There is a whole-hearted cooperation on the part of every State and local governmental department, executive, legislative, and judicial, to safeguard the interests of the public.

In the city of New York narcotism has decidedly decreased during the past three years. This is evidenced by the fact that a beginner is now rarely found among the addicts recently apprehended. Constant vigilance is necessary, for relaxation on the part of the police would result in the immediate influx into this city of thousands of addicts from all over the country and addiction would claim many new victims.

Only about 10 per cent of the addicts arrested by the police are women. The percentage of female to male addicts is, however, much greater. They are not so liable to arrest, as comparatively few of them personally make their purchases on the street. It is delivered to them or bought usually through some male addict.

Evidence of the control of the situation is shown by the statistics of the ages of addicts. In 1921, when we were several months without a suitable narcotic law in New York City, a large number of individuals became addicts, mostly in the ages of 18, 19, and 20, and the peak age then was around 25 years; that is to say, there were more addicts giving the age of 25 years than any other age. In 1922 this peak age was 27 years, while this year the ages 27 and 28 are almost equal.

SUMMARY

Figures received from 7,559 physicians, or 51.37 per cent of the total physicians in the State of New York (14,715), and figures received from 4,335 dentists, or 60.89 per cent of the total in the State of New York (7,119):

Morphine prescribed in 1922 (physicians), 1,392 ounces, or 43,296 grams.

Heroin prescribed in 1922 (physicians), 30 ounces, or 933 grams.

Cocaine prescribed in 1922 (physicians), 610 ounces, or 18,971 grams.

Cocaine prescribed in 1922 (dentists), 1,716 ounces, or 53,368 grams.

Number of narcotic addicts treated in 1923 was 775.

The questionnaire to which reference is made in this paper has added to our available knowledge of this subject. The medical and dental professions have given splendid cooperation, for which I am deeply appreciative. Their aid in securing the data, comprising expressions of opinion based upon professional experience, utilizable for lay purposes, will be employed for the purpose of solving some of the questions of the narcotic menace.

We may hope, then, that future generations may be free of a curse which has been interlinked with criminality throughout the ages.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the amendment that has been discussed for several days in the Senate is one which, as I said on a former occasion, has attracted the attention of Congress for a great many years. To my mind, the evil that it seeks to remedy is so apparent that it is surprising how, in a civilized country, the people would submit to the injustice that it does seek to remedy. If we permit railroad companies, by means of the power that they now have, apparently, without this amendment being enacted into law, to continue to use that power, we simply say that a favored community shall grow and prosper and that a community not thus favored shall pay additional taxes and bear additional burdens.

When it is claimed, for instance, that we can ship freight from Chicago to Spokane, Wash., and that in the same car or in the same train we may have another shipment of the same kind, of the same weight, going on to Seattle, and that we will compel the merchant or the purchaser in Spokane to pay a higher rate of freight than the merchant or the purchaser in Seattle, we are laying down a principle that can not be defended and never has been defended and for which no man can give any reasonable excuse.

That is a sample of what is going on everywhere. I heard a Senator the other day say that on shipments coming from the West, going through Topeka, Kans., the freight charge to Topeka, Kans., was the freight from the shipping point on to the Missouri River and the local rate back to Topeka added. By what principle of justice can a practice of that kind be defended? I can see how the proposition might be defended that the freight should be the same, although that may have two sides to it; but conceding for the sake of the argument that it should be the same, I have never yet heard what, to my mind, was an argument based upon reason or justice that would justify the charging of a higher rate for a short haul than a long haul when the short haul was included in the long haul. That is a system in our transportation more or less in vogue all over the United States, and always has been. Congress has been trying for many, many years to remedy the situation and in one way or another they always fail, even though they have enacted a statute which, it was thought at the time of its passage, would remedy the evil. Why it is that a proposition of that kind is not accepted unanimously is more than I am able to explain.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] was giving some illustrations of the benefits that come to the railroads in the development of some of our rivers in some instances where corporations and individuals somewhat equal to railroads in power were able to continue boats and barges upon our rivers, developed and built up by the taxpayers' money. But when that comes out into the general traffic in general transportation where the people generally are to get the benefit, then no such condition exists.

In the case I cited, for instance, in regard to Topeka, Kans., or some other point farther west, let us say Hutchinson, Dodge City, or some place the railroad runs right through, it means that the people in the interior points are either paying the losses of the railroad at the terminal point, or that the charges for freight at those interior points are away beyond what they ought to be. If the railroad company is making a profit, which it has a right to make, of course, upon shipments to the terminal point, then if it charges a higher rate for less labor and a shorter haul at an interior point, it logically follows that the rate at the interior point ought to be reduced. If they are carrying the freight to the terminal point at a loss, then they are recouping the loss from the less favored communities in the interior. No defense can be made for the practice in either case.

But the Senator from Idaho, when speaking of the influence that the railroads seem to have to prevent legislation sometimes, called to my attention the wonderful propaganda that has been going on against any change in the so-called Esch-Cummins Act. I suppose every Senator and every Member of the House has had the experience that I have had. Thousands upon thousands of letters come from various kinds of business men in all the localities of the country asking us not to change the Esch-Cummins law and particularly not to change section 15a. I had the experience of having received 8 or 10 letters from a little town in my State, all to the same effect, all written in different language, but all asking the same thing. The next day I would get 8 or 10 letters from another town, 15 or 20 miles away, and so on all the time. That has been going on for months, and is still going on. I took occasion one day to take up the letters that came from one town at the same time, and wrote a letter to each one of those persons and asked them how it was that they came to write the letter. Some of them never answered me, although I inclosed a stamped addressed envelope for reply in every case. Some of them were kind enough to say that on the day when they wrote the letter the attorney for the railroad company had been to see them. One man said, "In fact, he wrote my letter on my typewriter and I signed it. I do not know anything about it. I have not given it any study."

One of the peculiar things is that the people do not know, they do not seem to realize, that they are paying the expense of this propaganda. This attorney who was traveling around was traveling ostensibly on a salary from the railroad company paid by the railroad company, with his expenses paid by the railroad company; but as a matter of fact the people of those towns who purchased anything that had been shipped on the railroad were the people who paid that fellow's salary, and paid for the writing of that letter. It makes very little difference to the company how much the expense of this propaganda is. It is very little concern of theirs how many million dollars it costs, because it is all in the freight bill, and the people who wear clothes, who eat food, wherever they are, are paying their proportionate share of that expense.

I have here a copy of a telegram sent out by the Great Northern Railway Co., and it is only a sample. All the companies are, of course, engaged in the same propaganda work, and we are paying the expense of all of it—every cent of it. It does not cost them anything. This telegram is sent in cipher, in part, and I want to read it to the Senate. I have omitted the name of the person to whom it is sent and his address, because I do not want to identify him and possibly get him into some trouble. The telegram, which is in part in cipher, reads as follows:

St. Paul, April 23, 1924.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO.,

House bill introduced by BARKLEY abolishes Labor Board and puts national labor unions in very powerful position as against railroads. Under new rules, bill has been called out of committee for consideration by House and comes up on or about May 5; please confer with other railroad counsel in your State and see whether through cooly plaster and mattings in your stroll abide of leech craft cars drunk time rebuke chide. At conference of railroad counsel to-day all agreed if any useful results are possible, they will be obtained through remit stoles thinly by sex filch.

M. L. COUNTRYMAN.

I will now read that telegram as it is translated, so it will appear in the RECORD decoded. It reads as follows:

House bill introduced by BARKLEY abolishes Labor Board and puts national labor unions in very powerful positions as against railroads. Under the new rules, bill has been called out of committee for consideration by House and comes up on or about May 5. Please confer with other railroad counsel in your State and see whether, through business men and interests in your State, the House can be convinced to oppose bill. At conference of railroad counsel to-day all agreed if any useful results possible they will be obtained through other sources than railroads direct.

M. L. COUNTRYMAN.

I have here a general letter that went out from the law department of the Missouri Pacific Railroad. It is directed "To all local surgeons," and reads as follows:

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.,
LAW DEPARTMENT,
Atchison, Kans., March 7, 1924.

To all local surgeons:

A meeting was held in the office of the general solicitor of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, at Topeka, with reference to the situation at Washington.

The situation at Washington indicates that there is danger of legislation in the Senate and House striking at the transportation act of 1920, and there is so much activity in the direction mentioned as to make it necessary to intensify our efforts to defeat the same without delay.

It was decided at the meeting to call on all local surgeons to proceed at once and secure letters from business men, farmers, and others, directed to the congressmen of their district, setting forth, briefly, why the transportation act should not be repealed or amended, but given a fair trial.

I am sending you herewith the following documents:

(1) Memorandum dated Chicago, January 21, prepared by S. T. Bledsoe, Santa Fe general solicitor.

(2) Letter from Earl H. Ellis, Santa Fe solicitor for Colorado, to Mr. Gardiner Lathrop, dated January 19, 1924.

(3) Points to be used in the letters above referred to.

I am also inclosing a copy of an editorial article entitled, "The transportation act," from the Kansas City Star, December, 1923, which argues against the amendment of the transportation act.

It is of supreme importance that we get as many letters as possible forwarded promptly to our Congressmen and Senators. We do not expect them all to be in the same form. This should be avoided. I am asking you, therefore, to give preferred attention to the subject matter of this letter and lose no time in getting as many letters as possible and having them sent to our Senators and Congressmen.

If you are put to any expense in this matter, such as automobile hire in going to other towns to secure these letters, let me know amounts thereof, and I will make voucher to cover.

Since the expense would be incurred by surgeons, I suppose, there would be something in the vouchers to show that some person was sick or was hurt. The letter continues:

I shall thank you, within the next 10 days, to send me a list of persons who have written letters at your request. You can assist the writers of these letters in preparing the form, having them as different as possible, and not of a rubber stamp, stereotyped character. Immediate attention to this matter is especially requested.

If you can get a few prominent farmers to send in such letters, it would be of much benefit.

Please regard this communication as confidential and not for publication.

I beg pardon; perhaps I ought not to have read it; but that suggestion comes so late in the letter that it had gotten out before I really had time to stop myself. The letter is signed—

Yours truly,

W. P. WAGGENER, General Attorney.

That letter was sent to all the surgeons of the system. The people of the community do not know that the surgeons of the railroad companies are doing anything except that which pertains to their professional duties. They do not realize that a great propaganda is on and that surgeons as well as attorneys and other agents are all engaged in the same kind of work if they obey the directions given to them from the top.

Mr. President, in that letter it will be remembered the writer said he included "points" which he wanted to be emphasized in the letter. I have the inclosure, and find that he has stated 11 points. The first point which he wishes them to emphasize in the letter—and Senators who have read the letters which have come to them will recognize these points—is that the railroad is giving the best service ever in the history of the United States. The second point is that they are enabled to give this service under the transportation act. The third point is that under section 15a it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe rates which shall yield a fair return, and so forth.

I will print the entire inclosure with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

POINTS

I. Best service in 1923 in railroad history.

II. Result of operation under transportation act.

III. Most valuable provisions of act are:

1. Section 15a, making it duty of Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe rates which will yield a fair return.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 of section 13 relative to the supervisory control of the Interstate Commerce Commission over intrastate rates.

IV. While less than a fair return, as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, has been realized under the prescribed rates, yet the income has been sufficient to enable the railroads to pay expenses of operation and small dividends, and their credit has been stabilized so as to enable them to raise and borrow money for pressing capital expenditures.

V. A repeal of section 15a would undoubtedly lead to reduction in rates, which is the real object of the repeal, with consequent reduction of railway revenue and inevitable impairment of service.

VI. Railway credit would also be seriously crippled.

VII. A restoration of the power of the State commissions over intrastate rates, with a limitation upon the supervisory control of the Interstate Commerce Commission thereover, would seriously affect the orderly administration of the transportation act as to rates and bring back the chaos and costly litigation of former years.

VIII. The business and shipping public by a great majority are well satisfied with the present law and the performance of the railroads under it and are opposed to its amendment.

IX. Reductions in rates would bring but little relief to the individual farmer who is complaining, but would shrink the revenues of the railroads to the danger point.

X. Efficient transportation is essential to business prosperity.

XI. Good service is of far greater importance than a reduction of rates.

Mr. NORRIS. I have here a letter which is directed "To all local attorneys in Colorado." It is dated January 18, 1924, and is signed by Earl H. Ellis, general solicitor of the State of Colorado. I am not going to take the time of the Senate, Mr. President, to read the letter, but I will state that it is along the same lines, except it is more in detail than is the letter which I have read which directed the surgeons of the railroads to go out and get letters from business men and farmers addressed to Senators and Members of the House of Representatives asking them not to make any changes in the Esch-Cummins law. I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FOSTER BUILDING,
Denver, Colo., January 18, 1924.

To all local attorneys in Colorado:

I have stopped the practice of sending out marked copies of the Traffic World, because I found that they did not make the rounds very promptly. I have looked through the last few numbers, having in mind the thought of what might interest you in connection with our publicity program, and think it proper to comment upon the following matters:

Recently the directors of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association adopted a resolution which pointed out that the lumber industry can not be served except by regular and dependable car supply; that the Government operation of the railroads failed to give the country efficient service; and that restrictive railroad legislation has resulted not in better service or in lower rates but in financial and physical impoverishment of railway transportation; that during the past three years the railroads, operating under the present law, have furnished the lumber industry with the most satisfactory transportation service in its history, so that:

> "The lumber industry is opposed to further legislative experimentation with the railroad service; to any action that will unnecessarily impair the credit of the railroads or that will hinder or discourage the efforts of the railroads to develop for all American commerce prompt and reliable transportation service at reasonable rates."

Perhaps some of you know lumber people well enough in your community to call their attention to this resolution and to request that they write a letter to any Congressman known to them, placing the stamp of their personal approval upon this argument of the lumber industry generally.

On January 5 to 8 the sixth annual business meeting of the American Fruit & Vegetable Shippers' Association was held at Chicago. At the meeting there was approved a report of the traffic committee, in which a further trial without change of the present transportation act was recommended, and it was ordered that copies be forwarded to all legislative representatives. At the meeting W. A. Schumacher, general freight manager of the Fruit Dispatch Co., gave an address and drew applause, it is reported, when he declared that the carriers needed to be let alone and that efficient service was of greater value to the fruit and vegetable shipper than a rock-bottom rate. In discussing the transportation act he declared that the so-called "guaranty of earnings" clause was in reality a limitation-of-earnings provision.

Perhaps some one of the fruit and vegetable shippers in your community would feel inclined to echo this sentiment in a personal letter, if they happen to know any Congressman well enough, and if you should make the suggestion to them.

A recent bulletin of the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York stresses that continued trial of the transportation act of 1920, maintenance of the existing railroad rate structure as satisfactory to all interests for the present are the cardinal features of a sound railroad policy. The company points out that a reduction in rates on agricultural products would fall on the carriers least able to stand the loss (meaning, among others, the western railroads). Also, it is axiomatic that any savings to the farmers would necessarily result in heavier costs to other classes, with no general benefit to all. The bulletin asserts that a lowering of rail earnings would not constitute a tax on the wealthy people of the country, but would fall upon 2,000,000 owners of rail securities, many of them persons of small means. From the pamphlet I take the following quotation:

> "To nullify, directly or indirectly, at this time, the principle of a fair return on a reasonable valuation, as expressed in the 1920 law, in the face of the generous response of the railroads to its own provisions, and before its full effects can be known, would be not only an act of bad faith but a misdirected effort to remedy conditions whose real causes lie quite outside the field of railway legislation."

I have recently sent you a copy of the Santa Fe bulletin, in which Mr. Storey so clearly proves the fact referred to above that the reasons for high rates lie outside of the railroad legislative field and are purely economic.

Secretary Mellon of the Treasury Department, in his annual report, first points out that the benefit the country has received during the past year was on account of the liberal expenditures by the railroads. He says, however, one unsatisfactory feature, and that is that the funds for this purpose have been almost wholly provided by borrowing under bond issues. Of course this can not be a permanent financial scheme, so unless a proportion of the new capital is provided in the form of proprietary investment the credit of the country would suffer, interest rates upon their offers will have to be advanced, and soon a limit will be reached to such borrowing power. So he concludes:

> "The public is interested in maintaining the credit and the service of the railroads, and especially interested now that their expenditures shall be in 1924, as in 1923, a strong supporting element in the general employment business situation."

As you know, rail executives are planning to keep up the remarkable improvement program for the coming year, believing that Congress is not going to change the present law. Any change of any serious nature whatsoever would undoubtedly, in my opinion, result in an immediate curtailment of the railway companies of these expenditures, which are so beneficial to the general situation throughout the country.

Walker D. Hines, former Director General of Railroads, recently made a very able talk in connection with section 15a of the interstate commerce act, the basis of the present structure of freight rates. He referred favorably to the decision of the Supreme Court which has denied the validity of the contention made by a few railroads relative to the recapture clause and has upheld the excess-earnings provisions of the transportation act. He sees in this a reason for insisting with greater emphasis and confidence than ever before that section 15a be not repealed. His suggestion to the business men of the country is so important that I feel that I should give it to you, as you may find the opportunity to use it in discussing this general question with any business man or Congressman.

> "If your public Representatives say they are favorable to this repeal, ask them to search their conscience and tell you why. Do they wish to break down the railroads so as to bring about eventual Government ownership and operation; do they wish to aid in bringing about a practical situation where rates will be lower than are necessary to meet the legitimate cost of railroad operation? If not, why do they wish to repeal section 15a? They certainly will not admit that they do so for the purpose of leading the public to believe that the repeal will bring about rate reductions which they believe would not be brought about. Nor are they likely to admit that they simply want to shift the entire burden of responsibility to the commission and be wholly free from any such burden themselves, and yet that is one of the most obvious things that would be involved in a repeal of the section. Congress would be washing its hands of a great responsibility in connection with an essential affirmative policy for protecting the transportation which the people need. Nor are our public Representatives who seem favorable to a repeal of this section likely to admit that they wish to abandon an affirmative and comprehensive policy toward the railroads and go back to the old-time piecemeal policy of negation. But if none of these things do account for their position, then why do they wish to repeal section 15a? I urge you to press that question home and to insist upon an answer. If they come forward with an adequate substitute, some other and better expression of the comprehensive and affirmative policy which is indispensable to give the people the transportation they need, a different situation would be presented. But no such substitute is proposed. It is a bare proposal to undo what has been done, to return to a negative policy instead of an affirmative policy, and I urge you to continue to ask why this should be done and to insist that it shall not be done."

If you find such a letter as this of any value or assistance to you I shall be very glad.

Very truly yours,

EARL H. ELLIS,
Solicitor for Colorado.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if all citizens of the United States realized that the propaganda such as has been going on for the last several months and which is still going on is conducted at the expense of the people at large and not of the railroads, they would appreciate the importance of it. The great efficiency that is claimed by the present management lies in part in the fact—and of that I do not complain—that they are able to pass on all charges to the consumers of the country. They ought, however, to be prevented from carrying on a propaganda as expensive and great as that which is going on now; they ought to be compelled to pay it out of their own earnings and not be allowed to charge it up as freight and passenger rates to the people of the United States, who must contribute the entire expense.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator whether the auditing system imposed upon the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission requires them to itemize expenditures of that kind? It has been represented to me that an enormous amount of money has been expended by the various railroads of the country for the purpose of carrying on a propaganda against the Government ownership of railroads and for the purpose of discrediting the administration of the railroads by the Government during the war. Does the auditing system descend so much into detail as to afford us any information concerning the total amount of money expended for such purposes?

Mr. NORRIS. I am unable definitely to answer the Senator's question. I may be wrong about it, but, in my judgment, the auditing system does not do that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How is it in the case, for instance, which the Senator has mentioned?

Mr. NORRIS. The letter which I read was directed to the surgeons of the railroad. I emphasized as I went along that portion of the letter which advised the surgeons that if they incurred any expense, if they hired automobiles to go to other towns, for instance, to send in a statement and it would be covered with a voucher. The man who wrote that letter was not a surgeon. He was one of the attorneys, and I presume he would cover the expense in a voucher that would show the expenditure of the money in the line of duty of the surgeon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But when I go to the monthly report of the railroad company showing its receipts and expenditures, under what head would such expenditures as that be found?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume they would be found under the heading of expenses of surgeons. The expenses incurred under the other letter which I read here would come under a different department; probably they would come strictly under the legal department, and I presume, if the local attorneys went to any expense, that a voucher would provide for their expenses and, perhaps, would include payment for their time, although I do not know as to that, and would be covered up somewhere in the books as expenses of the legal department, and so on.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am reminded that when I was a youth in Wisconsin lumbering was extensively carried on, and the manager of the winter camp used to send in a bill which included the item of "incidentals." That item was generally regarded as covering drinks.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I presume there would be some of the same kind of "incidentals" in the work of the surgeons and attorneys to which I have referred. Probably if it were necessary to get a good letter from a farmer he would like to partake of those "incidentals."

Mr. KING. Perhaps they would include cider or homemade beer.

Mr. NORRIS. Possibly.

Mr. President, it seems to me important that we should bring home to the people of the United States the fact that they are paying the bill for these expenditures. As the Senator from Montana has said, the propaganda of the railroads against Government ownership, their propaganda against a change in the law, and their propaganda when the time comes—and it does come every little while—in regard to the appointment of some man on the Interstate Commerce Commission or perhaps on the Federal bench, carried on all over the United States, involve the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars. The expense of postage alone on letters that come to Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate is something enormous. They are coming to my office, and have been coming for months, at the rate of from 10 to 15 every day. Somebody writes them. In many cases men are on the road traveling around doing the work. They all get good salaries; they all stop at good hotels; and the entire bill is paid for by the farmers and business men of this country. In other words, the people of the country are being bled and made to pay for their own deception.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The Senator might add also that Mr. Countryman himself, the vice president and counsel of the Great Northern Railroad, is out every week making speeches telling that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], myself, and others are out with threshing machines for the railways. I imagine that expense is also charged up, and we have to pay the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to discuss—briefly I hope—the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. In my judgment, this amendment, which provides for enforcement of the long-and-short-haul clause of the interstate commerce act, is one of the most important measures that have been presented to Congress in the present session, indeed that have been before us in a great many years. I know of nothing that enters more closely into the daily relations of life than transportation. It affects everything we eat, everything we wear, the houses that shelter us, and our means of getting from place to place. It really and truly enters into our daily life as closely as anything can possibly do.

The question before the Senate to-day was stated very tersely at a meeting of the rivers and harbors congress in this city about two years ago, when a joint debate was held on the subject: "Should water competition be considered a justification for relief from the long-and-short-haul clause?" The negative of that proposition was taken by Mr. Frank Lyon, an attorney of this city. He stated the question so much better than I can that I will read it:

> The concrete proposition which is now before this association is to have Congress enact a law depriving the Interstate Commerce Commission of the power to permit a railroad to reduce its rates to and from water-competitive points below a reasonable basis when such reduction is solely for the purpose of depriving the water lines of business they would secure if the railroad were forced to charge the water-competitive points the same reasonable rate that it must charge interior points.

That is the whole case—to pass a law that will prevent the railroads of the country from charging such low rates at water-competitive points as will deprive boats, whether ocean carriers or steamboats on our interior waters, from getting and doing the business they are entitled to receive by the natural advantages which their cheaper method of water transportation naturally gives to them.

Mr. President, I have always been in favor of the idea presented by this amendment. During my entire 25 years in Congress I have taken an interest in the development of the waterways of this country. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], in discussing this question two days ago, rather criticized the attitude of myself and others in so strongly advocating large appropriations for the improvement of waterways which are not used. That criticism was not an unnatural one on the part of the Senator, and I am sure he did not intend it in any improper sense.

We have spent very large sums for improving rivers which at this day are not being used at all, or used only very slightly; but, Mr. President and Senators, we have also spent large sums for improving rivers and connecting waters that are used, and used with tremendous benefit to the American people. Let me cite you the giant locks on the Sault Ste. Marie River, connecting Lake Superior and Lake Huron, the improvements on the Detroit River, the great improvements on the harbors of the Lakes. Vast sums have been spent for those connecting channels and lake harbors, with what result? A truly colossal commerce is carried annually from the upper end to the lower end of the Lakes and back again—from the upper end largely composed of iron ore to be converted into steel for the use and benefit of all the citizens of the land, and from the lower end mainly of coal for the use of the citizens of the great Northwest.

There is a vast commerce also in machinery, autos, lumber, furniture, and in package goods of various kinds and sorts. I have not the figures before me, but the last time I examined them that commerce ran into something like eighty to ninety million tons per annum, and it was carried at a rate averaging about one-ninth of the railroad rate of the country. For one-ninth of the railroad rate of the country this colossal commerce was carried on the Great Lakes because of the expenditure of several million dollars to construct big locks at the Sault Ste. Marie and to dredge the channel of the Detroit River and to deepen the harbors on the Great Lakes so that mighty steamers, truly ships, drawing 20 to 21 feet of water, could ply those Lakes—inland seas, as they are justly called. Mr. President, all America has received wonderful benefits from those waterway improvements.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not the costs to which he now refers upon the Great Lakes would be substantially the same or would they not be very much less than the costs upon what might be called inland streams, rivers, and waterways; and, secondly—if I may ask two questions at the same time—whether the cost of handling bulky material, such as were carried upon the ships, would not be less relatively than the cost of handling manufactured and more valuable articles and commodities, because in carrying the latter it seemed to me that both ships and railroads would be compelled to employ instrumentalities and agencies of a higher character and to bestow upon them greater care than would have to be bestowed upon the bulky and less valuable articles?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is a very pertinent question. To answer the latter part of it first, there is no doubt but that it costs more to handle ordinary merchandise, manufactured articles of iron and steel and wood, package goods of every kind and sort, than it does to handle such commodities as iron ore and coal, to which I have just alluded.

There are wonderful appliances for handling ore and coal on the Great Lakes. I had the pleasure of visiting the Mesabi Range, at the western end of Lake Superior, several years ago. I went out into the country about 80 miles from Duluth-Superior and saw this very rich iron ore, 65 to 70 per cent iron, being scooped up from the ground in steam shovels—not mined in the ordinary sense, but dug up in steam shovels—and loaded onto cars. The cars then traveled for 80 miles to the city of Duluth, and went out over the docks on their rails. They had automatic openings underneath and these openings dropped the ore into the great docks, which were built, as I recall, for a long distance out over the lake and high above the water. The boats then ran alongside these ore docks. There were large steel chutes running from the lower portion of the ore docks into the hatches of the ship—one chute for each hatch—and it was entirely feasible to load one of those big steamers, carrying nine or ten thousand tons of ore, in 60 to 90 minutes.

I do not know any place in the world where commerce is handled more expeditiously than there. That ore ship would then go through the entire length of Lakes Superior, Huron, and Erie to the ports in the State of Ohio, such as Cleveland, Ashtabula, Conneaut, and others, or to Buffalo, N. Y. There it would dock alongside of railroad tracks, and with a perfectly marvelous machine, known as the Hewlett automatic unloading machine, this ore would be picked up in a big scooping shovel handling 6 or 7 tons at each load, would be whisked up from the ship, carried on an overhead trolley, and dropped in the car without being ever touched by human hands. That car would carry it to local furnaces or to Pittsburgh or wherever it was to be handled.

That was a wonderfully cheap method of handling the ore at both ends. Coal was handled very much in the same way. I saw great cars loaded with many tons of coal picked up, swung out by a great crane over the ship, and tilted so that the entire load of coal was dumped down into the ship. Of course, it is impossible to handle ordinary commerce by any such method as that; but a great advance has been made, let me say to the Senator, in the handling of many kinds of commerce. Truly marvelous water terminals have been constructed on the Mississippi River within the last few years. Many devices, the product of the best engineering skill, have been placed along these waterways, and it is possible to load and unload freight from the boats at a very small charge. A great deal of the commerce on the interior rivers—to make some kind of comparison between the freights there, as I understood the Senator's question, and the freights on the Great Lakes—a great deal of the commerce on these interior rivers, certainly in the past, was coal, the fuel which is essential to human civilization. That coal was carried down the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers in great fleets of barges. There is an instance on record where a steamboat carried in one tow 56,000 tons of coal in a fleet of 72 barges. That coal was loaded at the extreme upper end of the Ohio River, either in Pennsylvania or West Virginia. It was carried down the river on freshets. It could not be conveyed during the greater portion of the year, but when the water was high in the spring, for several months when there was good boating on the river, that coal was carried down in small tows, was picked up after it reached the Mississippi River, bunched together in this one immense tow, and carried all the way down to Louisiana.

That kind of commerce was as cheap as the commerce on the Great Lakes. Gen. William L. Sibert, one of the most remarkable engineers this country ever produced, the builder of the Gatun Locks and Dams at Panama, a colaborer in the wonderful task of constructing the Panama Canal with General Goethals and General Gilliard, made a most elaborate study of transportation on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and according to him the cost to carry coal down the Ohio, when canalized to 9 feet, and the Mississippi would be about one-eleventh to one-tenth of the average railroad charges in the country.

Beyond question, Senators, water transportation is much cheaper than rail transportation where you have good channels available all the year round. The frictional resistance of water itself, a fluid, is infinitely less than that of steel rails. A given amount of energy applied to a vessel loaded with a thousand tons or ten thousand tons of freight will carry that freight a great deal farther and easier and at infinitely less expense than if carried over a railroad. Your own common sense will tell you how much easier it is to move a load on the water than over a dirt road or a steel railroad.

There is no question, Senators, but that the god of nature intended the waterways to be used by man as transportation agencies. We have had the railroads for only a little over a hundred years. We have had real beneficial development of railroads for less than a hundred years; but during all the ages of time prior to the last hundred years man was dependent upon the waterways. The great cities of the ancient world were always found on navigable waters. There were comparatively very few highways of any consequence anywhere on earth. We read of the famous Appian Way and some good roads in the old Roman Empire, but the roads were very few and very far between. People could travel by water with comparative ease, but it was extremely difficult to travel by land.

In the early days of our Republic, the days of the immortal Washington, great interest was taken in waterways. Some historians say of Washington that not only was he the Father of his Country but, in a particular degree, the father of waterway transportation in this country. As I understand it, when he was notified of his nomination for President of the United States he resigned his position as president of a canal company to become President of the United States.

The initial cause, the main cause, for the convention which resulted in our great Constitution was the necessity of the various States getting together on transportation problems. In many instances rivers were the dividing lines between the States. Interstate commerce was a problem of extreme difficulty. It was absolutely necessary to provide for close interstate relations; and because of the troubles between Maryland and Virginia on the Potomac, and Pennsylvania and Delaware and New Jersey on the Delaware, the first interstate convention was called, which resulted later in the convention that created our Federal Constitution. It was necessary to settle this very problem of water transportation.

George Washington predicted, in the early portion of his career, following the Revolution, that if the Atlantic States did not connect with the Ohio Valley by a good, sufficient waterway, the people of the Ohio Valley would separate and form a government entirely distinct from that along the Atlantic. From the earliest days of this Republic until very recent times we used the waterways and derived great benefits from them.

As the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] said in his able speech two days ago, when he and I were boys—I believe I was a little bigger boy than he—living on the banks of the Mississippi River in northeast Louisiana, there were a great many steamboats, and magnificent boats they were, plying the Mississippi River. But at that time there were no railroads to serve the large population on each bank of the river. The only means of transportation from New Orleans up to St. Louis, from St. Louis on to Kansas City, from Kansas City on and on and on, up to Fort Benton on the Missouri, was by boats. The only way to reach most of the river points up to Pittsburgh, a thousand miles up the Ohio, was by boat. The only way to get up to St. Paul and Minneapolis in those early days, perhaps a little earlier than the time to which I have alluded, was by boat.

In spite of the fact that there were many shallows in the river which interfered with navigation during extreme low-water seasons, and in spite of the fact that ice interfered materially during several months of the winter in the upper stretches of the river, those boats gave the people reasonably good and cheap transportation for several months out of each year, and the only transportation they had. Certainly, Senators, there were no highways in those days; there were no railways, and it was either use such waterways as the god of nature had given us, unimproved as they were, or not travel. That was the situation.

When the railroads came they found it advisable from their narrow and unwise viewpoints to destroy water competition. All up and down the Mississippi River, at such points as Baton Rouge, Plaquemines, Vidalia, St. Joseph, and Lake Providence, in my State; Natchez, Vicksburg, Greenville, Friars Point, and other places in Mississippi; Helena and other points in Arkansas; Memphis and other points in Tennessee, and so on up the line, the railroads said, in substance, "We do not propose to have boats competing with us and carrying freight a great deal cheaper than we can possibly carry it."

I will not attempt to go into details on that; it has been done already; but, as a matter of history, the boats were gradually driven off the river by the railroads making such low rates at river points that the boats were unable to compete with them, and in that instance these railroads charged very much higher rates at interior points sufficiently far from the waterway so that it would cost more to haul by wagon from the point to the river than the extra freight would amount to. In other words, at interior points they placed on the commerce all the charges that it would bear. If a town was 10 or 15 miles in the interior and there was an impassable forest or swamp between that point and the river, they charged just as much from that point as from an interior town 100 or 200 miles from the river-competitive point. They succeeded thoroughly in driving the boats off the river.

Now comes the question, Why did we go on improving the rivers, seeing there were no boats on them and no commerce? Why did Congress undertake, at a cost of what I believe will ultimately be more than $100,000,000, to canalize the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo?

That is 1,000 miles of river. It runs through the most marvelous freight-developing region in America. There is no place on this globe—and I say it advisedly—which generates anything like as much commerce in tons—I do not say in value, but in tons—as Pittsburgh and the district 50 miles around it. Students of the subject say that the commerce of that region is greater than the combined commerce of London, Liverpool, Hongkong, and New York, greater than all four combined, not more valuable than all four, for it is commerce composed very largely of steel and iron and coal and the products of those three minerals.

However, Senators, it costs practically as much to convey from Pittsburgh to the seaboard a ton of coal as it would cost to convey a ton of the most valuable manufactured products that can be conceived. To a great extent a ton is a ton when it comes to conveying it from place to place. After the railroads had driven away the boats they began to put up the rates and to make things extremely unpleasant for people along the rivers. So throughout the land waterway associations were formed for the purpose of assisting in and urging Congress to improve the rivers in order that they might become the same effective carriers of freight in the future as in the past. The engineers were required to survey the Ohio River to see if it could not be made navigable every day throughout the year when the ice permitted boats to travel. The engineers found that it was feasible and practicable to do so.

Congress undertook the improvement of the Ohio River by a law enacted in 1876 and we have been enacting laws ever since to improve it. The original law provided for a 6-foot channel. In 1910 the law was changed so as to provide for a continuous depth of 9 feet all the way down the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo, by the construction of 53 locks and dams at an estimated cost, to complete the improvement in 1910, of $83,000,000, if my memory is correct. That act provided that the work was to be completed within 10 years. Fourteen years have elapsed since 1910, and according to the latest information from the Engineer Corps of the Army it will require at least five or six years longer to finish the Ohio River work. So we are going to be 10 years behind time in completing that work which was begun in 1876. In this connection let us not forget that the Panama Canal—by odds the most difficult and expensive waterway improvement ever undertaken—was completed and in operation within 10 years from its inception.

Surely no one can expect boats to compete reasonably with railroads along the banks of the Ohio—and I use that as an illustration for other waterways—unless the river is so improved that they have a continuous certain period of navigation when free from ice. I have just told of the colossal commerce on the Great Lakes amounting to 90,000,000 tons carried at one-ninth of the average railroad rate. On the Great Lakes there are between four and four and a half months of ice. Boats can only run about seven and a half to eight months at the outside. Yet commerce knows definitely and positively that for the other seven and a half to eight months great fleets of boats are going to run, and carry that commerce at very low rates.

If we could have the Ohio improved so as to have a dependable channel of 9 feet for every month of the year except when stopped by ice—say eight dependable months from the high water of the spring until the ice accumulates in December—there would be large fleets of boats on the Ohio. They would carry very large volumes of commerce from that great freight-producing region, the Pittsburgh district and throughout the entire length of the river. They would carry the products of steel and iron and porcelain and everything made of minerals for 2,000 miles down the Ohio and the Mississippi to the ocean at New Orleans to be transshipped thence to the marts of the world. They would carry a vast commerce on the Ohio, if the other rivers were properly improved, down to Cairo and up to St. Paul, out to Kansas City and Omaha, and up through an improved Illinois River to the city of Chicago and the Great Lakes. They would carry it, Senators, through the 16,000 miles of navigable waters of the Mississippi River system if all those rivers were properly improved as some of them are now being improved. We can not use them effectively now, because of innumerable shallows and obstructions, but we would use them to great advantage if properly improved, and that is the answer to the query, "Why are you improving the rivers and not using them?"

One little river up near Pittsburgh was improved a few years ago, the Monongahela. On the Monongahela, a little river which many of us probably have never heard of, there were 30,000,000 tons of commerce carried last year—think of it—30,000,000 tons, at an average of one-third the average rail rates of the country. Who gets the benefit of that cheap commerce on the Monongahela River? Every one of us, for that commerce is iron ore and coal and the products of ore and coal, and every citizen of the Union is a beneficiary of the resultant low priced steel and its countless products.

It is needless for me to remind the Senate that the very large portion of our expenditures for rivers and harbors has been for the harbors of the country. The harbors, as we all know, are railroad terminals. What is the great harbor of New York, that of Boston, that of Philadelphia, that of Baltimore, that of Norfolk, of New Orleans, of Los Angeles, of San Francisco, Seatle, and Portland—what are all of those great harbors but railroad terminals? The railroads run into those ports, run up alongside the ships, unload their cargo into the ships, and receive a return cargo from the ships.

After 25 years of experience in Congress, 23 of which have been spent as a member of either the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House or the Commerce Committee of the Senate, I can say that I have never known any opposition on the part of the railroads or from any other source to the improvement of harbors. I have shrewdly suspected very serious opposition to the improvement of the rivers from our railway competitors. I hope I make myself clear. The harbors on which immense sums have been spent are cooperators, parts and parcels, of the railway systems, and wisely so. I am not criticizing it. They have been improved, with everybody willing to make the improvements, but when it came to improving a great river like the Ohio, with its wonderful potentialities as a competitor with railroads, somebody worked his rabbit's foot in such a way that although we began to improve the river in 1876—48 years ago—we are still six years away from completion.

Now, Senators, suppose anyone with plenty of money in hand—for no one can say the United States did not have sufficient money to improve the Ohio River, and no one can say we did not have as able engineers as there are on earth—should handle his private business in that way? What would be thought of him? That is not any more extreme than other cases I might mention. I use it as an illustration.

Again I say it is for such reasons as that that the waterway organizations throughout the land have insisted that we must make the rivers navigable all the year around. Right now before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry there is an extremely interesting hearing going on that has taken weeks and weeks of time in connection with the Muscle Shoals development. At Muscle Shoals we are building a great dam for the joint purpose of creating electric power and giving good navigation on the Tennessee River. In connection with it we have to construct another dam up the stream known as Dam No. 8. Then other dams will have to be constructed on the Tennessee. Work is going on upon many of the rivers of the country. Well do I recall that when elected to Congress in September, 1899, the first movement in which I took a live interest was the improvement of the Ouachita River in Louisiana and Arkansas. That was practically 25 years ago. We began active work on the river after a very desperate fight in Congress in 1902, 22 years ago, under the leadership of Senator Berry, of Arkansas, and of myself in the House. Just 10 days ago the first steamboat went up the Ouachita from New Orleans to Camden, the head of that navigation.

It took us 22 years to finish the locks and dams on that great river—and I use the term "great" advisedly—so that boats could load at New Orleans, go up to the junction of Black River with the Red, and up the Ouachita 400 miles to the city of Camden. We are going to use that river now. It is navigable for the entire year. It will be used, and great will be the benefit to the people along its banks. With that discussion as to rivers, I wish to say just a few words about the coastwise trade.

I have not looked into that subject very carefully lately. I listened to what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] said, and I have no doubt he stated the facts correctly, that if we do not watch closely and do not enact this amendment which he has proposed or legislation similar to that the vast coastwise commerce of this country will be destroyed.

I had a conference several days ago with several members of the board of directors of the National Merchant Marine Association, and one of the ablest shipping men in America made the statement that the coastwise business of this country is in very great distress and it is necessary to do something for it. Senators, all of us recall that when the World War broke out in 1914 all but 9 per cent of the foreign commerce of this country was carried in ships flying foreign flags. Only 9 per cent of our gigantic foreign commerce was carried under the folds of Old Glory; 91 per cent was carried in foreign ships, exactly reversing the conditions which prevailed 100 years before, when 90 per cent of our commerce and a great deal of the commerce of other countries was carried under the American flag and only 10 per cent was carried under foreign flags.

Our overseas merchant marine was in a very unfortunate position at the outbreak of the World War; but, thanks to the law prohibiting foreign vessels from engaging in the coastwise business of the United States, we had a very respectable fleet of vessels under our flag engaged in the coastwise business, a fleet consisting, if I recall correctly, of nearly 5,000,000 tons of good ships. When the cry went up for ships, more ships, and still more ships to carry food and supplies to our allies abroad, and to carry our men across the sea to save democratic institutions, we had at least the nucleus of a fleet in those coastwise vessels. They performed wonderful service to this Nation and for mankind, and we can not afford to do anything that will jeopardize the coastwise business of our country. If the railroads are to be permitted so to reduce their freight rates to seaport as to make it unprofitable for vessels to engage in the coastwise commerce, and so to drive those vessels from the sea, I should consider it such a serious national calamity that it must be prevented at any cost; and such a calamity, beyond question, would be prevented should the pending amendment on the long-and-short-haul clause be adopted. That consideration alone, in my judgment, warrants us in adopting the amendment.

Senators, I have never knowingly given my consent to anything that was palpably unjust and unfair to any portion of our Republic, and no man with any real sense of fair play in his make-up can say that the interior sections of our country, away from the waterways, away from navigable streams, and especially those sections which are located in what are known as the intermountain region, have been treated fairly in regard to their freight rates.

Their treatment has been unjust in the extreme, and I for one am willing now, as I have always been willing, to vote for any law that will bring about reasonable and proper treatment of all sections. In this category I include not alone the intermountain section, for there are plenty of other towns and cities in this land, situated 25, 100, or 150 miles away from navigable waters and a thousand miles or more from the intermountain section, which need relief. So do not imagine that that section alone is interested in this question; a great many others are likewise interested, and common decency requires that all of them should be properly and fairly treated.

Mr. President and Senators, beyond any question it is our duty, especially in this period when freight rates are high, when the cost of living is high, when the cost of everything is high, so to act, if we possibly can, that we may have a reduction in the cost of transportation.

Do not understand me as being inimical in any sense to railroads. I consider that the railroads of this country have been the most marvelous developers of civilization the world has ever known. Our great country could not have gone forward by leaps and bounds as it has, could not have risen to the highest place in the world, but for our great railroad systems. I give them proper credit; but, while I accord them all the credit to which they are entitled, I deem it the part of wisdom, I deem it essential for us to develop and use the highways and to develop and use the waterways to the very fullest possible extent.

There is a trinity of transportation—highways, railways, and waterways. There should be no rivalry between them, no competition between them; they should be friendly; they should cooperate in every way. As Schley said to Sampson after the Battle of Santiago, "There is glory enough for all," so we may say of the highways, railways, and waterways, "There is business enough for all three systems of transportation in this country." Let us develop them and use them. Certainly if the Maker of the universe so planned His work that waterways can carry freight for very much less than railways can carry it, we are not cooperating with the Creator unless we use those waterways. He intended them for use.

I have shown that the colossal commerce of the Great Lakes is carried at one-ninth of the rail rates; I have shown, according to Colonel Siebert, that a great portion of the commerce of the fully improved Ohio and Mississippi can be carried at from one-tenth to one-eleventh of the rail rates. Then, if that be true, it is our duty beyond any question, Senators—it is our bounden duty as patriots and lawmakers—so to legislate that these waterways will be used. And I say to you that I know of nothing that will tend more to bring them into use than the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. President, I have very little more to say. I should like to read as part of my remarks two telegrams addressed to Mr. William Allen, Munsey Building, this city, by Mr. Theodore Brent, of New Orleans. Mr. Brent is one of the best traffic men in America, and for many years was connected with the railroads.

For the past few years he has been in charge of the barge line on the Mississippi River, the line of boats running from New Orleans to St. Louis, which we have every reason to believe is going to prove quite successful in carrying large quantities of freight and greatly reducing the rates thereof, although at the present time the reduction is only 20 per cent. That is, this barge line, in its incomplete condition, with unfinished terminals, with boats not equipped as they should be, and with a shortage of plant in many things, is carrying a large amount of freight at 80 per cent of the rail rates; and the railroads are carrying freight adjacent to that river, as the Senator from Nevada pointed out, at considerably less than their average rates—58 per cent of their average rates, the Senator reminds me. Let me say that it is not only the freight actually carried by the barge lines for which the shippers pay 80 per cent of the average rail rates, but there is a very large commerce carried by the railroads adjacent to the river for which the charge is only 58 per cent of their average rates; so it will be seen that that barge line is beginning to be of immense benefit to the people.

This telegram is dated May 14, from New Orleans, and reads as follows:

WILLIAM ALLEN,

830 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.:

I have already wired you giving my own opinion as to the Gooding bill. As to paragraph 2 of section 4, as administered by commission, there is no health in it for a water line. The commission has allowed the railroads to do what they please, and they have always been able to make a plea of changed conditions, other than elimination of water competition, which suited the immediate emergencies of the railroad. If the Gooding bill passes, we don't need the second paragraph of the fourth section. No person who hopes to see inland and coastwise water transportation, whether publicly or privately administered, become as permanent a part of the Nation's transportation system as the railroad should oppose the present effort to secure a more rigid fourth section. The 14 years of discretionary administration of this section by the commission offers little hope of stabilizing investment in water-transportation property under the existing law. Under a more rigid law requiring the railroads to consult the actual aggregate cost of rail transportation in fixing railroad rates, instead of their eagerness to absorb traffic which can be more cheaply carried by water, it will, in my judgment, result in a gradual and logical separation between rail rates and water rates commensurate with the relative cost of the service performed by each, and with the savings of water transportation easily reflected to the people of the interior through logical expansion of the system of joint rail, water, and rail rates.

BRENT.

In this connection I desire also to read the following telegram:

MAY 15, 1924.

WILLIAM ALLEN,

830 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.:

Your letter 13th. I have read CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as suggested. Senator PITTMAN is absolutely correct. I think it would be very foolish for friends of waterways not to join these intermountain people in their efforts to pass the Gooding amendment. At the very least we should not jeopardize river appropriations and barge-line legislation by any opposition to this law. I can not personally think of anything which will so tend to clean up the uncertainty as to the future of water transportation as to remove from the field of commission's discretion the administration of the fourth section except in matter of export and import rates which are essentially divisions of through rates to points beyond our country, and in allowing one railroad to meet the shorter haul of another railroad. Experience has proven that this is all the latitude that ever was necessary in order to give the proper measure of railroad competition; and now we should go a step further, and see that the railroads under the law are not privileged to prey upon the water lines. * * * Railroads put the steamboats on the Mississippi River out of business by just the same methods the transcontinental lines are using to put the coastwise ships out of business; and there is also pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission at present time a similar application on the part of the Mississippi Valley lines to do just the same thing with rates between Chicago and New Orleans.

BRENT.

Before concluding, Mr. President, I wish to say that in my judgment we are rapidly approaching the time when waterways are going to be used again. On a few of the rivers of the country the improvement is in such a state that it is feasible to use these waterways; and though the boats were driven off years ago, and though it is very hard to get men started again to using the rivers, it is being done gradually. If Congress will carry on for a few years longer the policy of improving a few of our great rivers, and of completing work already begun, such as the completion of the Ohio, to which I have alluded, of the upper Mississippi, of the Missouri to Kansas City, and of the Illinois to the city of Chicago, there will grow up within the next 10 years a very great commerce by water through all that interior section.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. BRUCE. I should like to ask the Senator just why it is, in his opinion, that general use is not made at the present time of the inland waters of this country for commercial purposes? To what does the Senator ascribe that fact?

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator had listened to me he would not have been obliged to ask that question, because I tried to cover it.

Mr. BRUCE. I listened, I can truly say, to every word the Senator uttered, and certainly his thoughts were very clearly expressed; but it seemed to me he never came just to that question.

Mr. RANSDELL. I tried to show that in the early days, when there were no highways and no railways, the boats were so much better than for people to haul their goods in mule wagons or ox wagons or something of that kind, that, although the rivers were frozen for several months in the year in the wintertime and were very shallow for several months of the year in the summer time, there was a period of a few months of each year when the boats could run on them, and they had a very large commerce. When, however, the railroads were built on either bank of the stream, and when the boats were completely driven away by the very low charges at river points, recouped by the high charges at interior points, the boats went out of business, and people have not been willing to put their money in them since.

Mr. BRUCE. What I want to ask the Senator is this: Are those boats being driven away at the present time by rate discriminations in favor of the railways?

Mr. RANSDELL. No, Mr. President; they were driven away years ago, and they have never come back.

Mr. BRUCE. But there must be some reason, then, for their never having come back, aside from railway discrimination. Why have they not come back?

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me ask the Senator, if he had a lot of money that he wanted to conserve for the use of his family, his wife and children, does he think he would invest it in steamboats on the Mississippi River, let us say, when there was a rival railroad on either bank of the river, and the moment he got started carrying freight on that river the railroads would make such low rates at Baton Rouge, and Natchez, and Vicksburg, and Lake Providence, and Greenville, and Helena, and Memphis, and all the points up the river that he could not afford to carry the freight?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; I would, provided there was an Interstate Commerce Commission sitting at Washington pledged by the statute under which it was discharging its duties to foster and preserve both railway and water transportation.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to see the faith the Senator from Maryland has in waterways, for I have been a waterway crank for 25 years, and I have done everything I possibly could to encourage the use of these waterways. I have some good friends who have gone down in the slough of despond and in poverty in their old age as a result of trying to fight railroads by running boats. They can not do it. There is something wrong in the laws, and I believe this amendment will correct that wrong.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator will not be affronted, I am sure, if I ask him, then, whether he believes with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the tool of the railway companies of the United States?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to say anything of that kind. I would not go so far as that.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RANSDELL. Pardon me for a moment; then I will yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me say to the Senator from Maryland that what a man drinks in with his mother's milk influences him during all of his life; and the Interstate Commerce Commission was created for the purpose of regulating railroad rates. If the Senator will examine the law, he will not find that it mentions waterways. There is not anything about waterways in it. The commission has not any right to regulate rates by water, either on the ocean or in the interior. It is a railroad organization, so intended by law, to regulate rates. It is natural that its members should lean that way. I do not believe that a single one of these gentlemen means to be corrupt or bad; but I believe that all the trend of their thoughts is to build up and maintain and strengthen the great railroad systems of the country, which they were created to assist and regulate. That is my view of the matter.

Mr. BRUCE. Why have they that bias, if I may ask the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. RANSDELL. Why, they were created that way.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator means the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. RANSDELL. The act itself creates a railroad commission. It does not create a waterways commission.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator is aware that the transportation act expressly declares it to be the policy of the United States Government to foster and preserve both rail and water transportation?

Mr. RANSDELL. I remember that well. I had the honor of being the author of those words, and for years and years and years we fought to get those words put in. I think they were put in in the act of 1920, were they not, just three or four years ago?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Up to that time we could not get even an expression that Congress wanted to have the waterways treated fairly, and I presume that since 1920 the commission is a little more friendly to waterways; but when you have grown up with a system, when you do absolutely nothing else but that all your life, you can not help leaning to it, and these gentlemen naturally lean toward the railroads. I would if I were one of them.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator is aware that the commission has jurisdiction over lines that are partly rail and partly water, under the same common management and control, is he not?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; but we have no lines now that are partly rail and partly water.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. RANSDELL. In substance that is true. I am going to reach that in a minute. In substance we now have no lines that are partly rail and partly water except the barge line on the Mississippi, and, perhaps, some of the lines on the Great Lakes. The boats were so completely driven out that they do not exist. We have a few lines that are not common carriers. Take the situation on the Ohio: The United States Steel Corporation has built some wonderful barges there.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield to the Senator from Idaho in a moment. Jones & Laughlin, a tremendously big corporation at Pittsburgh, have built some extra good barges, and they go down the Ohio River on the freshets in the spring loaded with thousands and thousands of tons of steel products for my section of the Union and for other sections. They are not common carriers, however, and they are not subject to this law. They are private carriers.

Mr. BRUCE. Is it not the real fact that inland water transportation is subject to certain transportation shortcomings, as compared with rail transportation, that the Interstate Commerce Commission, as a body of sensible, judicious men, are bound to recognize?

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRUCE. I object to the Senator from Idaho taking me off the floor.

Mr. GOODING. I merely want to correct the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Louisiana can take me off the floor, but not the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to yield to the Senator from Idaho until the Senator from Maryland has finished his query.

Mr. BRUCE. Exactly; I knew the Senator would not.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to do that, but really I do not want to yield for a speech. I am glad to yield for a question.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course. I do not want to make a speech. The Senator has answered all my questions. I am very much obliged to him for answering them. I will put no more.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield now to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I wanted to correct the Senator from Maryland in regard to a statement. I did not make the statement that all the members of the commission were tools of the railroads. I did say that some of them were, and I am glad to have a chance to repeat that. I have come to that conclusion as the result of things that I know, telegrams that I have put into the RECORD, where the chief executives of the railroads were going to the commission in a body, not to present facts and evidence in regard to why there should be a violation of the fourth section, but merely because they were the chief executives of great railroads. Those were matters of record that are part of the record of the Senate, and I put them in, taken from the files of the railroads and railroad organizations.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield further to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. GOODING. Judge Prouty has been spoken of. I have a very high regard for him. I have a very high regard for men who are now on the commission. I do not think we ever had a greater man in the service of the country than Judge Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as far as that is concerned. There have been many other great men who have served their country on this commission. Judge Prouty is a big, broad, true American, and I have respect for such men; but when I know, after I have made a study of these questions, how they get violations of the fourth section, that there have been practically 6,000 violations made without much or any investigation and without a hearing, and that out of all that have been made in only some three hundred and odd has there been any hearings at all, I make up my mind that there is some influence besides evidence.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Maryland, if he cares to say anything.

Mr. BRUCE. I have nothing more. I have elicited from the Senator from Idaho just what I wanted to elicit, that if he does not think that all the members of the commission are the tools of the railways he at least thinks a majority of them are.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I hope I will not be considered as taking part in this criticism of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I have never found I could get anywhere in this life by criticizing people, and I never indulge in criticism; so I trust that part of this debate will not be misunderstood, as far as I am concerned.

I ask to have attached to and made a part of my remarks a brief address, only four or five pages long, delivered by Mr. Frank Lyon, of this city, before the eighteenth annual convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress held in this city on December 6, 1922. The convention on that date held a joint debate on the subject, "Should water competition be considered a justification for relief from the long-and-short-haul clause?" The negative was taken by Mr. Lyon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF FRANK LYON, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Ladies and gentlemen and members of the association, I hope I will be able to so state my case as to require no reply on my part. [Laughter.] I shall do my best to make it so that I will not have to make a reply. I am a lawyer. I am an advocate. I believe in a thing or I do not believe in it. I imagine I have before me a much easier task than had my opponent, because I have a partial and sympathetic audience.

If I understand the purpose of your association, it is to develop water commerce. You are not particularly solicitous about the railroads of the country, except as they serve your needs, just as other inventions serve them, but I assume you are here to serve the interests of the water lines, and I am here to join you, and to tell you from the experience I have had how it may be done. The method that has been pursued by my honorable opponent, against whom I have appeared for the last 10 years in many controversies before the Interstate Commerce Commission, is the best way to wipe out transportation by water that could be devised. I point to history in support of that statement. This country now has the greatest natural system of waterways in the world. The possibilities of its development are beyond the imagination of the present generation, and it lies with such organizations as this to initiate the steps required for its development. We have the greatest rivers in the world. We have the greatest harbors. We have probably the longest coast line. With these wonderful natural facilities placed at our disposal by nature, what has been the history of water transportation during the past 60 years—since the advent of railroads in the equation of transportation? You gentlemen know that as well as I do. Water as a means of transportation has been in use since the earliest times. The aborigines had their canoes, and then came the application of the sail as applied to the canoe. This transportation goes back thousands of years. It has been the means of transporting commodities from the earliest time.

About the beginning of the last century came the invention of the steam engine by Watt, and a little later its application to the railroad. Prior to the Civil War the development of the railroad was in its infancy. After that war there was a great impetus to the building of railroads, and coincident therewith was the disappearance of the ship. Prior to the Civil War the American flag was in all the harbors of the world. Since the Civil War the American flag gradually disappeared from the high seas. It was in part restored by the building of a great fleet during the recent war. Now it is proposed to subsidize those ships in order that the flag may continue upon the sea.

The coastwise traffic of this country has always been protected by laws which prohibit the engaging therein by foreign ships, but there never has been any law which forbade the railroads from depriving such ships of business by the railroads charging less at the water competitive points than they do to points in the interior where there is no competition. I am here to advocate a line of policy on your part that will lead to the enactment of a law which will not permit the railroads to deprive the steamships of business by charging less than reasonable rates at the ports of call of the ships. Under the present law the Interstate Commerce Commission may authorize lower rates at the water competitive point. This authority should be withdrawn.

It is a question of governmental policy as to whether there shall be transportation by water. The Government might adopt a policy, or rather continue the present policy, of throwing all of its energies to the development of the railroad, leaving the ships to take only that business which the railroad does not want. I heard a prominent attorney of one of the transcontinental lines make an interesting argument upon the proposition that it is vastly more important to develop the railroad than the ship. While I do not agree with that contention, it is understandable from the point of view of those who have money invested in railroads. But what I have never been able to understand is how an advocate from Seattle, an important port on the Pacific, the residence of my opponent, could advocate any policy that would deprive Seattle of one pound of transportation by water. The only advantage a seaport has over an interior point is the fact that it is accessible to transportation by water, and here my opponent advocates a policy which has the effect of transferring from the bottoms of the ships to the railroads traffic that would naturally go by water if it were not for the policy advocated by him. It is a natural argument for the representative of a railroad. It is an unnatural argument for the representative of a port.

The concrete proposition which is now before this association is to have Congress enact a law depriving the Interstate Commerce Commission of the power to permit a railroad to reduce its rates to and from water competitive points below a reasonable basis when such reduction is solely for the purpose of depriving the water lines of business they would secure if the railroads were forced to charge the water competitive point the same reasonable rate that it must charge interior points.

If the authority granted by the commission to the railroads to charge less than reasonable rates to the water competitive points does not have the effect of either diverting to the railroads a portion of the business then being handled by the water lines or preventing new business from coming to the water lines, the action of the commission is of no avail whatever to the railroad. It is important to get this thought clearly in your minds. The purpose of a departure from the rigid provision of the fourth section, that the railroads shall not charge less for the longer distance, is to divert natural water-borne business to the railroads. This fourth section of the act to regulate commerce has been amended two or three times, but the fundamental purpose has been written into all the amendments. Long before 1887, when the act to regulate commerce was enacted, railroads were charging less at water competitive points, and that policy has continued down to the present time. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a regulating body, created for the purpose of looking after the interests of railroads and shippers over railroads. It has no official duty with reference to water lines. The commission has no authority over ships and the steamships have no rights before the commission, unless it be in the case of joint rates. The commission has always been most courteous in permitting the representatives of the water lines to appear before it when fourth section applications were being considered which would have the effect of diverting business to the railroads if authority were granted. In the transportation act of 1920 Congress has said that railroads may earn 5½ or 6 per cent, and it is the duty of the commission to see that they do earn this if reasonably possible and the interests of the water carriers are not to be considered by the commission in its attempt to have the railroads make these earnings.

Do not understand me to imply that the commission is without sympathy for the water lines. What I mean to say is that Congress has so framed the fourth section, and the exceptions to be authorized thereunder, that it is entirely within the limits of propriety for the commission to lean toward serving the railroads at the expense of the water lines. In other words, your remedy is before Congress and not before the commission. So long as Congress leaves the law in the form it now is, that the commission may allow less rates at water competitive points than at intermediate points, it is inevitable that the commission will lean to the granting of such authority when the railroads show that the water lines are getting the business. The commission may not be justly criticized for this attitude.

During the war there was no transportation by water between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the railroads secured 100 per cent of the business. That was the ideal condition from the railroads' point of view. After the war the steamships again reappeared in the coast-to-coast business. In the nature of things they could not have reappeared had they not made rates lower than the reasonable rates that had been heretofore charged by the railroads. They could only secure business by reducing rates, as their service is less attractive. As soon as the steamships commenced to secure this transcontinental business in such volume as to justify their continuance in the business the railroads applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for leave to depart from the rule of the fourth section by charging less between the coasts than to intermediate points. There were several of these applications before the commission, some on westbound business and some on eastbound. The commission granted some and denied others. The denial was not based upon the fact that if granted the business would be diverted from the water to the rail line.

The basis of these applications by the railroads was that the ships were taking business between the coasts which they had not theretofore handled, and that in order to prevent this it was necessary that the railroads should be authorized by the commission to charge less for the haul between the coasts than to intermediate points. This means that less than reasonable rates would be charged by the railroads between the coasts while reasonable rates would be charged to the intermediate destinations. It is well recognized that the additional cost of handling additional business is less than the average cost of handling all business. In other words, with the railroads operating between the coasts, if business now carried by the ships could be transferred to the railroad, the additional cost of handling this new business would be relatively small. It was upon this theory that the case was presented to the commission and the railroads showed that they would not lose money by taking on the additional business at less than just and reasonable rates as that phrase is understood in the first section of the interstate commerce law.

The commission has heretofore recognized this as justifying an exception to the fourth section, if other provisions of the law were not violated. These low rates could not be authorized if their application unduly prejudiced the interior. Some of the applications made by the railroads were granted and some were denied. It would be tedious for the audience for me to here enter into a detailed discussion of the technical grounds upon which the applications were granted and denied. Suffice it to say that the denials were not based upon consideration for the water lines. The westbound applications were in such form that the commission held some sections would be unduly prejudiced if they were granted. These denials have worked to the advantage of the water lines to as great an extent as though there were a rigid fourth section applicable to this particular business. However, these decisions favorable to the water lines may be reversed at any time the commission should change its mind or whenever there should be a change in membership. It must be remembered that substantially the same law has been in effect since 1887, and this is among the few decisions rendered that have curtailed the activity of the railroads in depriving ships of business where actual water competition was shown. Owing to this uncertainty as to what will be the attitude of the commission from time to time, it is vitally important that it should have no discretion and that the railroads should be forced to adhere to the strict provision of the fourth section where water competition alone is involved.

Members of the association will remember that in these recent transcontinental applications some were granted and some were denied. It may be that upon a second application some of those now denied may be granted. It may interest the association to know that there is set for hearing at Salt Lake City on January 30, 1923, a number of applications of these same transcontinental carriers for permission to depart from the rigid provisions of the fourth section in the making of rates on hides from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast. This involves identically the same question that was in the application for leave to depart from the fourth section in the case of wool, which was denied by the commission.

The shipping industry can not be built up successfully so long as the Interstate Commerce Commission is left discretion to allow departures from the fourth section which have for their purpose the limiting of business to be transported by water. To do away with uncertainty the law should be either that the railroads may take all the business or that the boat lines should be allowed to engage in the transportation without having hanging over them the continuing threat that at any moment this business will be taken from them because of authority granted by the commission to the railroads to charge less than reasonable rates at the water competitive points.

The issue is clearly drawn and is simple. There may be no denial of the fact that if the water lines transport the business the railroads will lose it. The converse is equally true. If the railroads transport it, the boat lines will lose it. It is for this association to take a definite and positive position in support of its own interests, and that position should be that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not have authority to allow the railroads to charge less than reasonable rates at water competitive points.

In these applications the railroads in making them and the commission in rendering its decision often speaks of dividing the business between the water lines and the rail lines. In fact, that is what meeting competition means—that both means of transportation shall do part of the transporting. However, you can never get the railroads to say what proportion of the business they hope to take from the water lines. The reason for this is that they intend to get it all, if they can do so under rates that will be allowed by the commission. It is only a pretense on their part to say that they want only a portion of the business. If they are entitled to take 1 per cent of the water business, they are entitled to take 99 per cent of it so long as they do not place a burden on other railroad traffic, and that is what they intend to do under their application. The history of railroading shows that that is what they have substantially done upon all the inland waterways of this country.

Due to the war, the high railroad rates charged during and since the war, and to the fact that the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission as at present constituted is more favorable to water lines, there has been a substantial increase both in coastwise and inland water-borne traffic. If this attitude could not be changed, the water business would continue to grow, but so long as that attitude is subject to change, as it is under the present law, the ventures in water lines will be restricted, as no one will know when his investment will be made unprofitable by the granting of applications.

That the granting of applications in the past has gone further than the law contemplated is evidenced by the fact that the water competitive points have always been represented before the commission by counsel and traffic men, urging the commission to grant the application. Of course if these applications went no further than to give to the water competitive points only the advantage which they enjoyed by water, there would be no occasion for representatives of the water points to be insisting before the commission that the applications be granted. The moment you see one of these attorneys or traffic men appear before the commission on behalf of the application of the railroad you may rest assured that granting the application will give the water competitive point something more than it has been able to secure by the water line. During the past 10 years, in which I have represented the water lines in the transcontinental cases, our strongest opponents have been not the railroads but the terminal cities. The representatives of those cities have insisted that the applications be granted, although they represented the ports from which the ships sailed. It is a strikingly inconsistent attitude for the ports to insist that the Interstate Commerce Commission pursue such a course of action as will deprive the ships serving the ports of the only business they are able to secure. Yet this has been their position in all these cases, as it is that of my opponent here.

Not only have the railroads insisted that they had a right to meet the water competition at the places where that competition actually existed but, under the principle of "market competition," they have insisted that they have a right to deprive the water lines of business not only by making less than reasonable rates between the ports but by making less than reasonable rates from an interior point of manufacture to the port reached by the steamship.

As matters now stand the commission has no obligation to the steamships, while it has a definite obligation to the railroads, and it is but natural that it should decide fourth-section applications with that duty ever before it. It is for the commission to say how far the railroads may go in reducing rates to meet water competition. The only limitation is that the rates shall not be so low as to cast a burden upon other commerce. It must at least pay the extra cost of handling the additional traffic. This additional cost is so low that if allowed to be applied by the railroads there will be little water transportation. It will be remembered that this "out-of-profit cost" is not the "out-of-profit" cost from port to port, but from some interior point to the port of destination. Under such conditions no water line could meet the situation. Under that practice the railroads have in the past been allowed an exception under the fourth section in making rates from Colorado to San Francisco to meet the competition of boats from New York to San Francisco. In this case the "out-of-profit" cost is only that cost from Colorado to San Francisco. The recent decision of the commission in the transcontinental cases leans away from this method of making rates. But up to that decision the commission has authorized the meeting of water competition under the conditions named.

Compared with the twelve thousand million tons of freight orginated by railroads each year in this country, the amount handled by the water lines is comparatively trifling. In the transcontinental cases it appeared that in 1921 the total tonnage, both eastbound and westbound, through the Panama Canal from coast to coast was about 1,500,000 tons, and that the earnings were not over $15 a ton, making the gross revenue $22,500,000. The gross revenue of the rail carriers in 1921 was over six billions. The purpose of the fourth-section applications was to transfer part of this $22,500,000 to the railroads. If they had secured all of it they would hardly have known that it had been received.

In closing I can only repeat that if you are to serve the interest which brings you together in the Rivers and Harbors Congress it is necessary for you to urge an amendment to the Interstate commerce law to the effect that water competition shall not constitute an exception under the fourth section authorizing the charging of less for the long than for the short haul. [Applause.]

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has been ably discussed. If Senators still are in doubt, I would ask them to send for a copy of the hearings held by the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate in this session of Congress. It is a voluminous document, containing 887 pages.

I will not take the time to read even extracts from the hearings, nor would I ask a Senator to read all the hearings, but whoever reads a considerable part of these hearings will be convinced, as, indeed, any fair mind would be convinced, of the gross injustices and the discriminations of the long and short haul. I hope that when the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is called to a vote, as I understand it will be very soon, it will prevail.

I have said nothing up to this time on this subject, because what I had intended to say has been said in a better way by other Senators than I could have said it. Upon this subject I will ask Senators to recall that when the conference report on the railroad control bill, which was House bill 10453, was pending before the Senate in February, 1920, a number of speeches were made on the conference report, which was adopted by the Senate on that day.

At that time the then Senator from Mississippi, Mr. John Sharp Williams, spoke upon this subject of the long and short haul. Not only was that Senator a philosopher, not only do we remember him for his flashes of Gallic wit, but we recall that when he applied his faculties to a question he usually produced a result that could be defended. It so happens that he gave the long-and-short-haul question his attention, and I am going to read a part of the remarks he delivered upon that subject when the conference report on what we now call the Esch-Cummins bill was before the Senate. That was on February 23, 1920. Pretermitting other matters not pertinent to the issue, I read as follows from Senator Williams's remarks:

Mr. President, I am in favor of the adoption of the conference report, although there are several provisions in the bill and several provisions in the existing law of which I do not approve. However, when you are brought face to face with a situation you are not called upon to say what is the best thing possible, but what is the best thing presently attainable. I think that this conference report is the best thing presently attainable. I do not, however, want my position in favor of the adoption of the conference report misunderstood, and therefore I want to say that in a part of what has been said by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] I sympathize very much. As to that, I like to go back to history for an argument.

When the original railroad commission bill, as it was called, which afterwards became the interstate commerce law, passed the House of Representatives under the championship and leadership of Mr. Reagan, of Texas, afterwards a Member of this body, and prior to that time postmaster general of the Confederacy, and a man of very great ability, it contained a proviso to the effect that there should never be a freight rate for a short haul exceeding a freight rate for a long haul upon the same road in the same direction. When that bill got here the Hon. John Sherman, then a Senator from the State of Ohio—I believe it was he, but if not he, he advocated it, at any rate—proposed an amendment which the Senate adopted, putting in three little words—

We recall with what remarkable emphasis, and even with what grimaces, the learned Senator from Mississippi spoke of those three little words.

Mr. KING. Weasel words.

Mr. ASHURST. Weasel words, he might have said, as I am reminded by the able Senator from Utah. I quote further from the remarks of Senator Williams:

"under similar conditions," I believe were the words, or, perhaps, "under similar circumstances" (under similar circumstances and conditions).

When the law went to the courts and to the Interstate Commerce Commission they decided that when freight was being carried from New York to San Francisco or from Boston to New Orleans on a railroad the railroad had a right to compete with water rates on the ground that water rates and land rates were not similar but dissimilar, and that, therefore, the three little apparently innocent words "under similar conditions" changed the entire construction of the law. They therefore ruled that a bale of cotton could be carried down the Yazoo River from my town, which was on the Yazoo River, to New Orleans on the railroad for $1.25, whereas from Vaughan Station, 25 miles due east from me, and the same distance on the same railroad, but not on a navigable river, they could charge $2.25 a bale. The decision was based upon the ground that Yazoo City was on a waterway and Vaughan not, although Yazoo was out of the direct way from Memphis to New Orleans. What has been the consequence? The entire actual commerce upon the Mississippi River has been killed as dead as a door nail. When I was a boy I could go down to the wharf at Memphis, Tenn., and find any day from 15 to 25 boats at the levee. You could have gone down to New Orleans and found still more; to Vicksburg, and found as many; but the minute the railroads were allowed to reduce their freight rates in competition with water rates just low enough to put the steamboats out of operation, the steamboats went out of operation.

Then a great many people in these towns on the rivers but in favor of river and harbor bills began to talke about "potential competition." What is needed is not "potential" competition but actual competition.

What was the further consequence? The further consequence was that the railroads on each side of the Mississippi River—and there is a continuous line on each side—were congested with freight, so that it frequently took absolutely a longer time to send a given commodity by freight on the railroad from Memphis, Tenn., to New Orleans, La., by rail than it did downstream by river, because the railways were congested. The reasons for that Senators who understand insurance and understand the remainder of the situation will appreciate.

Mr. President, what happened in Germany in connection with a similar condition? Under old Bismarck's wise statesmanship the German Reichstag absolutely forbade any railroad ever charging more for a short haul than for a long haul. There were railroads on each side of the River Rhine, and when I was a boy, before Bismarck's policy went into operation, the Rhine had no great cargo-carrying business at all. Tourists made use of it and it carried a few commodities from river landing to river landing, just as the Arkansas or the White River steamboats do; but after that policy was put into operation two things occurred. The first thing that occurred was that all the lumber and the iron ore and the coal, where expedition of delivery was not essential to the business, went by water down and up the Rhine, and other business requiring expedition went by rail, there being two continuous railroads, one on each side of the Rhine. The consequence was that the railroads were never congested and that the Rhine increased its business twentyfold.

The consequence of the other policy, which was pursued here, was that the great Mississippi River, the central artery of this country, carrying freight from St. Paul to New Orleans and from above St. Louis on the Missouri to New Orleans and from above Cincinnati on the Ohio to New Orleans, was absolutely crippled and put out of business except for a little coal delivered on barges downstream and some grain delivered in the same way.

So I am just as much opposed to the system which is criticized by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] as he is; but, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter] says, the fault is in the present law and not in this conference report. That is not all. That particular point about long and short hauls is not in conference at all. If the conferees had attempted to deal with it a point of order could have been made.

The Senator in another part of his able speech made a further statement that I desire to read. I recall that speech with particularity. I think I was sitting then in the seat I now occupy. The speech struck me so forcefully that when my attention was called to it yesterday I concluded that it ought to be delivered again to the Senate. He said:

Water carriage alone—a gift of God and of nature—makes a sufficient discrimination, and if a railroad were forbidden ever to charge more for a short haul than for a long haul, whenever they reduced the long-haul charge they would have to reduce the short-haul charge proportionately, and intermediate points would get the benefit, and this would avoid the very inequity of which the Senator from Nevada complains and would bring about that equality of opportunity which, whether for individuals or communities, spells equality.

I know in my own section how the scheme has been worked. Freight can be carried from Memphis to New Orleans upon the Mississippi River, by the Illinois Central, or the Mississippi Valley road, or on the road on the western side of the river. The rail rates are put just a little bit above the water rates, because they need not go quite down to the water rate. Shippers having the same rate both by water and rail will prefer to send by rail, with the idea that the shipment will reach its destination quicker. So the railroads put the boats out of commission; they were tied up, no new boats were built to take their places, and the great, magnificent interior waterway system that God gave this country has been deprived of almost all of its efficacy.

* * * * * * *

I do not so much reprobate the question of discrimination against intermediate points, although that is unequal, inequitable, unjust, and bad, as I do the destruction of the God-given navigability of the waterways of interior America. This is the very opposite of conservation of resources. It is destruction of natural resources by the artificial operation of statute law. Here is this great arterial system from above St. Paul to New Orleans, from the Blue Ridge down to the Gulf, from the Rocky Mountains nearly down to the Gulf; and by just three apparently innocent little words in a law this whole magnificent opportunity of the American people was destroyed. You may say whatever you please about old Bismarck and the Germans—and I have no good word to say of Bismarck's way of running his country—but Bismarck had better sense than that; he never destroyed the commerce on the Rhine; he built it up. He never destroyed the railroads, because while the water carried the heavy commodities, the railroads carried the light commodities, and wherever expedition of delivery was the chief thing to be considered the railroads carried the freight, and where cheapness of delivery was the chief thing the water carried it.

It seemed to me that the debate on the proposed amendment ought not to close until this contribution had been put into the RECORD. Paying my tribute of respect and admiration to all that has been said, and well said, this speech made on the 23d of February, 1920, by the then Senator from Mississippi, Mr. Williams, is to this hour unanswered. In my judgment it is unanswerable.

In conclusion, respecting the long and short haul, nearly everyone admits that it is a discrimination as it operates at this time. I repeat, nearly every person admits that it is a discrimination. A large majority of our citizens admit that it works an injustice. But there never has been a person in America who has replied to the charge that it was dishonest. No man can defend its honesty, because it is a dishonest provision. It attempts to do by indirection that which it has not the courage to do directly. It attempts to discriminate, and it does grossly and furiously discriminate, against intermediate points in favor of points, which, as the able Senator from Mississippi well said, have already by nature and by Providence been very sufficiently provided for.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the subject under consideration is of transcendant interest to the people of the United States, and particularly to various interior sections. The question of transportation now, as always, is one of supreme importance. The fertility of the soil, the increase in agricultural products, the thrift and industry of the people; all these things count for naught if transportation facilities are denied or are accompanied by obstacles so great as to deprive producers of profit upon their investments or reward for their labor.

In ancient times, when land transportation was limited to most primitive methods, the prosperous and progressive communities and States were found upon the shores and banks of oceans, seas, lakes, and rivers. The wind and the sail and the boats propelled by human hands carried the products of the people to waiting markets. The shores of the Mediterranean Sea were dotted for hundreds, if not thousands of years, with mighty cities made great and populous by their maritime trade.

Wealth results from barter and trade, from the sale and exchange of commodities and the products of labor. The Greeks and Phœnicians were trading peoples and gained eminence centuries ago as a result of the intrepid spirit of their traders and seamen, who carried from port to port and country to country not only the products of Hellenic States and Phœnician cities but also those of many races.

Venice wore the crown of commercial primacy because upon the seas were thousands of craft carrying under the Venician flag the products of all climes. Great Britain's marvelous development is attributed to her maritime activity. Before the days of Drake England's place in the world was not conspicuous; but when British ships traversed the seven seas and sought the ports of all lands the day of her greatness dawned and the foundations of her commercial and political power were laid.

In the early days of this Republic and, indeed, until the time of the Civil War, this Nation was a strong competitor of Great Britain in ocean commerce. From the shipyards upon the Atlantic coast came the swiftest and best cargo-carrying vessels. The harbors of the world were familiar with the Stars and Stripes which fluttered from the mast-heads of innumerable American ships which brought to our shores, and carried from our ports to many lands, products essential to the people of the world. A trading people will become a prosperous people. It is important that there should be great production, but it is essential that proper and adequate transportation systems, both rail and water, shall be developed if industrial progress shall be enjoyed by the people of this age.

Following the Revolutionary War, the adventuresome sons of American fathers turned their faces toward the West. They crossed the Alleghenies and settled Kentucky and Tennessee and other sections out of which great Commonwealths have been carved. Still others pushed beyond the Ohio and into the Northwest Territory, where great States were founded. And as the years went by, their children looked beyond the Mississippi and toward the plains and mountains of the West and to the far-off Pacific coast. By their heroism, thrift, and industry they established towns and cities and States, and added to the wealth and glory of this Republic.

The numerous waterways threading our vast domain were utilized by the people, and proved of value in the development of the country. They cheapened transportation and enabled the people to convey their surplus products, not only to interior points, but to ocean ports from which they were carried to the markets of the world.

The genius of America was never more conspicuous than in the application of scientific principles and new discoveries and inventions in aid of the industrial and economic development of our country. Steamboats were placed upon our rivers and lakes, and railroad lines crossed the land, binding together not only oceans which washed our shores, but all sections of our country. We often speak of the Seven Wonders of ancient times—of the Colossus of Rhodes, of the Hanging Gardens of Babylon—how little and insignificant they appear compared with the remarkable, not to say miraculous, development of railroads in the United States and the vast transportation system which was created.

At the beginning of the World War we had more than 280,000 miles of railroads within the continental limits of the United States; and these great railroad systems, notwithstanding their defects and the mistakes which the officials of some systems had committed, were serving in a fairly satisfactory way the needs of the people in many sections of our country. I do not mean to state that the conduct of all railroad companies was free from criticism or can be wholly indorsed. As a matter of fact, many injustices were perpetrated and oftentimes discrimination was practiced which not only proved injurious to some parts of our country but destructive of the prosperity of the people residing therein.

The American people for a hundred years following the Revolution were like a young giant. They burst their bonds and with a militant and buoyant spirit pressed forward into unknown projects and almost undiscovered territory, and oftentimes with heedlessness they pushed forward enterprises and projects without proper provision for their development or any recognized objective. The blood of youth was in their veins, and they were often carried forward upon the strong wings of a consuming ambition to accomplish big things in a big way. The material achievements during the period to which I have referred, utilitarian though they were, constitute an epic, and future ages will point to that time as one of the dynamic and heroic periods of the world's history. The business of the world was revolutionized, and the inventions and discoveries of men of genius were directed along practical lines and harnessed to the car of progress which carried the people of our country forward.

We do not forget Vanderbilt and the projectors of the New York and New England railroad systems, and those who developed the great railroad organizations in such States as Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, as well as in many of the Southern States; and when American railroad systems are discussed, we think of those who projected and built the railroads west of the Mississippi and to the Pacific coast. Stanford and Huntington and Hill, and a multitude of other great builders bulk large on the horizon when we speak of the railroad and empire builders of this Republic. Eulogies have been paid during this debate to those who have built our railroads and terminals; I join with Senators in paying tribute to those who have carried out vital transportation projects, who have planned great bridges and pierced mountains and performed difficult engineering feats required in the execution of the mighty tasks which they undertook. They were architects in the building of our Republic.

America has produced not only political architects who have builded a great political and governmental system and founded democratic institutions—which we pray may be preserved for all time—but she has given to the world architects and builders and engineers whose works have been the marvel of the age and whose labors have materially contributed to the happiness and welfare of the American people. These men have applied the scientific discoveries and inventions of the age, and have brought within the reach of the people not only the necessities of life, but commodities and products and countless other things which have ministered to the comfort and happiness of the people.

I should not omit to pay tribute to the moral and spiritual and intellectual leaders produced by our country, whose contributions to America's development and the progress of the world can not be estimated or fully appraised.

Mr. President, as I have indicated, while recognizing the merits, advantages, and benefits of our railroad transportation system, it must be confessed that there are defects in its framework, and there have been serious mistakes which have imposed burdens upon the people in its administration. Unfortunately at times men have seized control of railroads for selfish ends and have used them for personal aggrandizement. There have been crooked schemes devised and frauds perpetrated by manipulators and capitalists and promoters who exhibited but slight regard for the laws of morality and common honesty. These outstanding transactions and in some instances fraudulent and corrupt practices, however, provoked resentment upon the part of the people, and lead oftentimes to wholesale criticisms and indiscriminate condemnation of our entire transportation system. Undoubtedly in the early days of railroad building not only the promoters and builders but most of the people regarded these enterprises as belonging exclusively to the corporations controlling them or to the interests behind such corporations. The idea had not been developed that corporations existed not as a matter of right but by reason of the will of the people, and that transportation companies were common carriers and subject to State and governmental control.

Many railroad corporations and their managers resolutely opposed Federal or State regulation or any curb upon rates, either passenger or freight. The prevalent idea for many years was that railroads, being privately owned, were not subject to any regulation, either municipal, State, or National. This view led some railroad managers and some operating systems to pursue a high-handed and arbitrary course in their dealings with the public.

Senators are familiar with the system of rebates and the discriminatory and unfair practices which prevailed for many years. Finally legislation, State and National, corrected these evils, and the railroads accepted the view that they were common carriers, that they were public-service corporations, and subject to reasonable rules and regulations promulgated and enforced by National and State authorities. That rather dark and wholly unsatisfactory chapter in the history of our railroad development, I think, is closed. Generally speaking, I believe that those who own and control our railroads recognize that the welfare of the public is paramount and that railroads must be operated in the interest of the public and be subject to such reasonable regulations as may be prescribed by law.

It is to be expected that occasionally there will be found rebellious persons who can not accommodate their views to the changed conditions and to the true and proper concepts as to the functions of railroads and their relation to the public generally.

I have felt at times that some railroad officials have been indifferent to the needs of the people and were too strongly influenced by the traditions that have come down from the past.

Upon the other hand, we frequently find persons in official as well as in private life who regard the railroads as the exclusive property of the public or of the Government. They seem incapable of understanding that private persons have built the railroads, and that the billions of dollars employed in their construction and equipment have been furnished by hundreds of thousands of people whose holdings therein are represented by stocks and bonds. It should not be forgotten that many estates and insurance companies own railroad stocks and bonds, and hundreds of thousands of people of moderate means have invested a portion of their savings in railroad securities.

For years the railroad question has been the subject of controversy; it has aroused bitter discussion and has been the basis of political disputation. Among the farmers, the wage earners, the business men, the capitalists—indeed everywhere throughout the land, the question "What shall be done with the railroads?" has been the subject of discussion, often partisan and frequently in ignorance of facts. Intemperate remarks and unfair criticisms have been directed against the railroads and their management. Many who have discussed the question have been unwilling to consider all factors involved or all elements entering into the subject. They have been dogmatic, oftentimes selfish, and frequently ignorant. They have not always appreciated that the railroad problem is one of great intricacy and may not be solved by tyros or comprehended by superficial investigators. It is a problem calling for intensive study and sound judgment. It is not a subject which should be treated in a partisan manner, nor should it become the football of politicians. Unfortunately, efforts have been made from time to time to make it a political question, and upon many occasions it has been used for the elevation of unworthy persons to official position. And the railroads themselves and their officials have too often been arrogant in their dealings with the people and have sought to control States and their political subdivisions.

But I believe a new day has dawned and the railroad corporations and their stockholders and the majority of the people have a truer conception of the duties and responsibilities of transportation companies and their proper relation to the Government—State and National.

Speaking broadly, I think it may be said that railroad officials as well as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the various railroad commissions of the States are seeking the adoption of plans and policies which will best serve the people and at the same time protect the rights of those who have invested in the securities of transportation companies.

I am compelled, however, to modify this statement in view of the situation which was brought to the attention of Congress and which the amendment now under consideration seeks to correct. The action of the transcontinental railroads, which are seeking permission to modify, if not abrogate, the long-and-short-haul provision of the transportation act, seems to me to be a recrudescence of the policy of discrimination which has so marred the record of the railroad companies of the United States. I regret exceedingly such action upon the part of the railroads. It will provoke resentment and arouse prejudices which have been allayed, if not extinguished. It will tend to develop old feuds and controversies, the injurious effects of which will be felt sooner or later by the railroad companies.

Mr. President, while conceding that the transportation problem is a complicated one, nevertheless it would be childish to declare it to be insoluble, and therefore the public and railroad officials must deal with it in a capricious, haphazard, and experimental way. Much light has been thrown upon the subject of transportation during the past two decades, and certain rational—indeed some might say scientific principles—have been evolved. However, the railroad question has not yet been settled. It has not been determined what form of organization will finally be adopted. The extent to which the unification of all transportation systems shall be effected does not bring a concurrence of views.

Many of the States evince great dissatisfaction with the authority exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission over intrastate railroads, as well as over the segments of interstate railroads found within the boundaries of such States. Many believe that the Federal Government has exercised too much control over railroads, while others insist that there has been too little Federal supervision. We find still others contending that the Government shall take over the railroads and own and operate them.

While admitting that the railroad question is still in the lap of the gods, I believe that sufficient data are available to enable the railroads to formulate just and rational transportation policies. Undoubtedly the questions involved in rate making are difficult. I have thought at times, however, that some railroad companies have surrounded the rate-making structure, or the machinery which rate-making experts created, with an air of mystery, largely for the purpose of bewildering the people, particularly the shippers. Rate-making experts have accompanied their explanations with so many technicalities and dubious phrases and clouded utterances that State utility commissions as well as courts have sometimes been befogged and misled.

Mr. President, Washington is the Mecca to which come caravans, not all of whom are composed of wise men, who seek to impose their views upon Congress and to secure legislation and the adoption of executive and administrative policies which they believe, or affect to believe, are indispensable for the welfare of the people. Many foolish and fantastic schemes are suggested with reference to our transportation system, as well as activities which it is urged the Government must undertake. Some persons desire the States submerged and the assumption by the Federal Government of all powers now exercised by sovereign States and their political subdivisions. There are some individuals who profess their devotion to democratic principles and to what they call "progressive policies," whose only idea of progressivism is embodied in the doctrine that the Federal Government shall create a multitude of agencies and bureaus to whom shall be committed the power to rule the country. There are some who profess great interest in social questions, in education, in economic and industrial problems, but the solution offered by many of these individuals for the evils—real or imaginary—supposed to exist in our country, is found in the formula that Congress must enact more laws and extend the jurisdiction and authority of the General Government over States and individuals.

The idea of many of the people seems to be that bureaucracy and paternalism constitute the unfailing panacea for all social, economic, and political ills. It is sometimes discouraging to behold the lack of understanding upon the part of so many people as to our form of government and the checks and balances which have been provided for the preservation of the liberty of the people. It is amazing to find so many American citizens who are unaware of the rights of the States and the limitations placed upon the Federal Government; and it is depressing to discover the large number of unthinking people who are seriously engaged in the task of destroying local self-government and converting the people to the view that they are incapable of governing themselves or working out their own destiny, and therefore a powerful Federal and paternalistic Government must be created where authority will be exercised through hundreds of bureaus and departments and commissions and Federal agencies.

There are too many Americans who are constructing crutches to put under the arms of individuals and too few who are expounding those enduring principles which guided our fathers when they established this Republic.

Some of the class of people to whom I have referred are constantly importuning Congress to have the Government acquire and operate the railroads. They seem indifferent as to whether the owners of the railroads shall be paid for their property or not. Many such persons regard the Government as possessed of all power, seeming to be oblivious to the fact that such view would make a despotism of this Republic. The examples which we have before us, of the failures of governments to successfully and economically and efficiently carry on enterprises which belong to the realm of private endeavor, are lost upon these apostles of paternalism and bureaucracy, whose cries resound throughout the land and whose shadows haunt the Capitol. However, I shall not pursue this thought further.

Mr. President, I confess that I approach the discussion of the measure before us with some misgivings. I have given some study to our transportation problems and have endeavored to familiarize myself with the legislation of Congress, as well as that of most of the States; and I have followed with interest the decisions rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by our courts—State and Federal—upon transportation questions which have been brought to their attention; and I have given some little attention to the theory upon which freight rates are based and have sought to understand the effect of changes in the rate structure and the modification of what, in the absence of a better term, I shall call the "mechanism of rate making."

Of course, it would be presumptuous upon my part to say that I can throw any light upon a question which I have conceded is intricate and complicated. However, the point which I desire to discuss can not be dissociated from certain concrete and practical matters, nor from effects with which many people are familiar. Oftentimes, even without technical or expert knowledge, pertinent observations may be submitted where injustices are being suffered and policies executed which discriminate against sections or classes. The proposition before us is not new. Many sections of our country have suffered from what the people regard as discriminatory and unfair practices of railroads in charging lower rates for the longer than for the shorter distances between two points, the shorter being included within the longer distance. In many sections of our country it is believed that the railroads and the Interstate Commerce Commission have nullified congressional legislation which was enacted to protect interior points against a system of freight rates which, as applied, gave advantages to other sections, and particularly to terminal points.

The long-and-short-haul provision of various acts of Congress has been provocative of controversy, and the efforts which have been made, by those sections of the country which have suffered from the discriminatory rates imposed, to secure what they believed to be a proper interpretation of these acts, and the failures attending such efforts, have produced a feeling of exasperation and resentment which could only arise from a sincere belief that a gross injustice had been done.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] has presented in an admirable and able manner the position of some railroad officials upon this perplexing question. He attempted to demonstrate that the charging of less rates from coast to coast, or from one section of our country to another, than were charged to intermediate points upon the same line, would result in benefit to the people, taken as a whole, including, of course, those residing at such intermediate points. I am not able, Mr. President, to subscribe to the conclusions reached by the able Senator. The Senator from Arizona has just read from a speech delivered by former Senator John Sharp Williams on February 23, 1920, during a discussion upon the long-and-short-haul provision of the transportation act. This speech presents in a convincing way the arguments in opposition to the policy of permitting lower rates for a long haul upon the same road in the same direction than upon a short haul. He pointed out the disastrous effects of such a policy upon water transportation and the injurious effects resulting to intermediate points. He denounced the "discrimination" against the intermediate points as being unequal, inequitable, and unjust.

The pending amendment deprives the Interstate Commerce Commission of the power to grant departures from the fourth section of the transportation act to meet water competition. In other words, it gives full effect to the long-and-short-haul clause in so far as railroad rates may be affected by water competition. It does not forbid rail and water competition, but it does forbid the right to reduce rail rates to and from water competitive points, the result of which would be to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property. It compels, in effect, a rate structure which would compel the Interstate Commerce Commission to require that rates charged to competitive water points shall be compensatory and shall not only pay the actual cost of moving freight but contribute its fair share toward a fair return on the property.

The Senator from Maryland confessed, as I understood his position, that there should be some limitation upon the authority of transportation companies to impose higher rates upon the freight hauled to intermediate points. His position, as I understood it, was that it would be unfair if freight should be carried at a loss from one terminal point to another, so that freight rates to intermediate points would have to be maintained or adjusted to meet the deficit. However, he contended that to meet water competition railroads should be permitted to modify the long-and-short-haul clause of the existing law. It is difficult to determine just where the position of the Senator would lead us to, or where he would draw the line below which rates might not be reduced. I shall discuss this question later in connection with the 1920 act, providing that rates must be "reasonably compensatory."

Mr. President, it is possible that under some circumstances and for a limited period a policy may be justified which gives advantage to the long haul over the short haul, but no conditions now exist justifying further departures from the fourth section. Indeed, broadly speaking, I doubt whether a policy which permits discrimination resulting in higher rates for the short than for the long haul will prove beneficial either to the railroads or to the country. The injustices of such a course are manifest. It is unfair to charge the same rates from Chicago to Denver as from Chicago to San Francisco.

The intermountain States have been the victims of railroad rate discrimination, and this policy has prevented the development of the intermountain regions. It is apparent that a rate structure which discriminates against sections will arrest the development of that part of the country to which such discrimination is applied, regardless of its natural resources or the thrift and energy of its people. No part of our country can be prosperous without adequate transportation facilities, and such facilities are not adequate if discriminatory rates are laid upon it. For years it has appeared to the residents of the intermountain region that the railroad companies were more interested in developing cities upon the Pacific coast than they were in doing justice to the intermountain region and to territory west of the Missouri River.

It was felt that after some of these discriminations had been removed by the Government when it was operating the railroads there would be no further attempt to return to the old conditions; but certain transcontinental lines are now seeking permission, under the pretext of meeting water competition, to lay the heavy hand of destruction, through discriminatory freight rates, upon a large section of our country. The Senator from Maryland stated that there was no certainty that the Interstate Commerce Commission would grant the application, and therefore no legislation should be enacted to restrain it from exercising its discretion in the matter.

I concede that we do not know what action will be taken by the commission. However, if its former interpretations of the long-and-short-haul provisions of the law are prophetic of its action upon these applications, then there is real ground for concern upon the part of those residing within the intermountain region. The granting of the applications would prove so disastrous to this section that even the thought of it fills the people with dismay.

It has been said by persons familiar with conditions in the West that economic and industrial ruin would sweep over the intermountain States and severely affect other portions of our country. In view of this impending peril, the people of the intermountain States have been aroused to the imperative necessity of obtaining legislation such as is contemplated in the bill now before us.

Mr. President, I shall not indulge in harsh criticism of the Interstate Commerce Commission, although I feel constrained to say that some of its decisions in interpreting and applying the long-and-short-clause of the transportation acts have seemed to me to be illogical and at variance with the spirit if not the letter of the law. I appreciate the fact that the questions presented for their determination are intricate and complicated, and that the mutations in our economic and industrial life aggravate the problems presented for their consideration. It is also true that these changing conditions add to the problems of transportation companies. The construction of the Panama Canal introduced a new factor into the equation and perhaps called for a reexamination of the issues which theretofore have been raised. I know the practice is quite general throughout the country to denounce our courts and the Interstate Commerce Commission. Their decisions are often the subject of coarse and brutal criticism, and the officials themselves sometimes are not free from vituperative abuse.

Mr. President, in my opinion the judges of our country are men of probity and integrity. I think the same is true of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and, generally speaking, it may be said that our public officials measure up to the high standards of honor and integrity which should obtain among an enlightened people. As a lawyer I have met many judges and State and Federal officials. I have never seen a judge who I thought was corrupt or who betrayed his trust.

During this debate the Interstate Commerce Commission has been severely criticized, and I have felt that some of the criticisms have reflected upon the fairness and integrity of at least some of the members of the commission. I repeat that while I have not agreed with all decisions of this important Federal agency I have never felt that the members of the commission were actuated other than by a desire to be just and to administer the law as they understood it.

We must recognize the fact that individuals are influenced unconsciously by their training. Coming as I do from a section in which the people universally believe they have suffered from the failure of the Government to enforce the provisions of section 4 of the transportation act, it is quite natural that I should be influenced by that view. Those who are called to the bench or to fill positions with the Interstate Commerce Commission carry with them their former views and ideas. They do not change overnight, nor can they throw off the thoughts and habits of a lifetime. It is not expected that they should. But the history of our political institutions and of our courts confirm the statement that those who have been called to responsible positions in the Republic, or in the State, or in the executive, legislative, or judicial branches of our Government, have sought with fidelity to discharge the duties devolving upon them and to meet the responsibilities of their various callings in a patriotic and honorable way.

Recurring to the applications filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission by the transcontinental lines, I desire to repeat that the people of the West are filled with apprehension. They know what the consequences will be if favorable action is taken upon these applications by the commission. Prior to 1918, as Senators know, the departures from the fourth section of the transportation act, departures authorized or acquiesced in by the commission, brought disaster to the intermountain States.

Nature has endowed that part of our country with great wealth. The fields are fertile and the mountain streams carry vitalizing waters which, when applied to the soil, result in abundant harvests. The coal mines there found can not be equaled in any part of the world. Petroleum deposits are found in great stretches of oil sands hundreds of miles in extent. The mountains hold within their embrace gold, silver, lead, copper, and other precious metals the value of which can not be computed. The mountains and the plains and the deserts furnish food for cattle and sheep. The raw materials are there for great manufacturing enterprises and for industries of the most varied character. But with all these resources industrial and commercial advancement has been retarded, if not prevented, because of the discriminatory freight rates imposed. High freight rates have prevented the development of our coal mines and the establishment of important iron and steel industries. Agricultural products which can be produced in such great abundance are deprived of value because markets are closed against them through prohibitive railroad tariffs. And so it is both with respect to commodities and products produced in the region referred to as well as with respect to commodities imported into such district.

In 1918 some relief was obtained by the people of the region to which I am particularly referring. Freight rates became more equitable and uniform. It must be stated, however, that the rates imposed were so high as to prohibit the shipment from intermountain States of surplus products of the value of hundreds of millions of dollars, and these surplus products were needed in the United States and in foreign lands; but their value was destroyed and the industries to which the West was entitled languished and many of them died. Notwithstanding the great coal deposits from which the world could be supplied for thousands of years, Utah has been permitted to ship annually but a few million tons.

The same may be said of Wyoming, as well as other Western States, whose coal measures are inexhaustible. I repeat that the freight rates which have been and are in force make it impossible to ship from the West the mineral wealth, the agricultural products, and other commodities which are found there in such rich abundance. Without lower freight rates this section and other parts of our country will be prevented from developing and reaching that high standard of industrial and economic development which their resources demand.

A number of small industries, however, have been developed in Utah and surrounding States since some of the discriminatory practices to which I have referred were abandoned; but if the petitions referred to are granted then the industrial progress which is being witnessed will be arrested and industrial paralysis will follow.

Mr. President, it is a great mistake to have our manufacturing plants and factories in a few restricted districts. There is too much congestion in the "neck of the bottle." There should be more of a diffusion of the manufacturing business of our country. It would be far better for the Nation—and certainly for the people—if many of the great manufacturing plants, factories, and industries now crowding New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Chicago, as well as other points which might be mentioned, had been erected in the interior of the United States and in some of the Western States and upon the Pacific coast. The housing problem in the great cities would not have been so serious. We have witnessed the advantages of this decentralization of industry in some of the Southern States. There factories have been erected in country towns and in rural districts, and the people who work in manufacturing plants have all the advantages incident to suburban life.

President Harding, in his message to Congress in December, 1921, in effect, condemns the rate-making policy which has brought unhealthy concentration of wealth and industry in limited sections. His words are as follows:

> The existing scheme of adjusting freight rates has been favoring the basing points until industries are attracted to some centers and repelled from others. A great volume of uneconomic and wasteful transportation has attended, and the cost increased accordingly. The grain-milling and meat-packing industries afford ample illustration and the attending concentration is readily apparent. The menaces in concentration are not limited to the retarding influences on agriculture.
> Manifestly the conditions and terms of railway transportation ought not to be permitted to increase this undesirable tendency. We have a just pride in our great cities, but we shall find a greater pride in the Nation which has a larger distribution of its population in the country where comparatively self-sufficient smaller communities may blend agricultural and manufacturing interests in harmonious helpfulness and enhance good fortune. Such a movement contemplates no destruction of things wrought, of investments made, or wealth involved. It only looks to a general policy of transportation of distributed industry and of highway construction to encourage the spread of our population and restore the proper balances between city and country. The problem may well have your earnest consideration.

President Harding argued for a transportation policy which would tend to decentralize population and develop in various parts of our country manufacturing industries and markets, in order that there might be a symmetrical and proper development in our economic and industrial life. The discriminatory rates and the inequities found in rate structures of the past and, in part, of the present, are largely responsible for the unhealthy congestion and spotted industrial development of our country.

I am glad to know that some leaders in manufacturing industries are taking a different view from that which has obtained in the past and are erecting factories in small towns and in rural districts. Some of the problems of transportation would be solved if the factories and manufacturing plants were taken to the farms. If there were in Iowa and Nebraska and Kansas and in other agricultural sections large manufacturing plants, furnishing employment to hundreds of thousands of people, the farmers would have better markets for their products and would be free from the crushing burdens imposed by transportation charges, and the profits for their toil and labor would be very much greater.

In the Intermountain States the mineral and other resources are so great that hundreds of industries could be developed if reasonable rates could be obtained. The coal-tar products of Pennsylvania have aided in developing a great chemical industry. The bituminous coal fields of Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming are the basis for a multitude of chemical plants. The West needs steel and iron. It has iron deposits and coal from which a superior quality of coke can be produced, but the transportation problem stands as a threatening specter before every movement for industrial and commercial development.

Mr. President, it is not a satisfactory condition which develops prosperity in spots. We must have universal prosperity in our country. Our industrial system is faulty if it reduces the farmers to poverty and adds to the tremendous fortunes of the manufacturers and the great industrialists of the land. If for a protracted period agriculture languishes, its effect will be felt in the cities and in all sections of the country. Agriculture is the basis of our Nation's prosperity. The United States can produce agricultural products sufficient to feed the world, and our resources are so great that we can supply annually manufactured products of the value of billions of dollars for the people beyond our shores. If the West does not prosper and agriculture languishes, within a short time manufacturing plants will close and thousands of unemployed will walk the streets of our cities crying aloud for opportunities for work and bread for their families.

With our great resources, there should be no atrophy or hypertrophy. There must be no dilation of the heart or atrophy of the limbs. The blood of prosperity must course freely through all parts of the land, giving life and vigor to the people and producing a well-balanced and symmetrical development.

It is a mistake for railroads to dry up the fountains of wealth in some sections for the purpose of increasing production in other sections. A transportation policy which prevents the development of one portion of our country in order to overdevelop some other part can not be defended in morals or be justified upon any rational ground. Railroads are public agencies, and they must not use their powers to destroy communities or sections. The laws under which their charters are obtained should prevent discriminations and should require of them the adoption of just and fair measures and the execution of policies which will have the interests of all the people of our country at heart. Much of the prejudice against railroads, and I regret that there should be any prejudice, has resulted from the feeling that some railroad officials have been indifferent to the needs of the people and to the just demands which they have made. There is a feeling that there have been too many conflicts between rival groups of capitalists to obtain control of railroad companies, whether competing or not; and many people feel that they have been mere pawns upon the chessboard to be used in promoting organizations which have played with railroads as if the people had no interest in the same.

Let me repeat what I stated a few moments ago, that the time has come when the transportation question must be settled along the lines of justice and equity. The owners of the railroads are entitled to a reasonable return, and a railroad policy must be adopted which will encourage capital investments in railroad development. With the growth of our country, the expansion of business is sure to come. We must add annually to our railroad trackage thousands of miles. There must be no confiscation of property, no governmental or bureaucratic oppression which will paralyze the initiative and the genius of railroad managers and operators. The railroads must be so operated as to command the confidence and support of the people, and a spirit of mutual good will and fellowship must be cultivated.

The growth of our country is such that the freight carried by our railroads doubles every 10 or 12 years. If time permitted, I could show, covering various decades during the past four or five decades, the remarkable increase in the freight carried by the railroads of our country. It is likewise true that the gross earnings have increased in a most astonishing manner during the last 15 years. During the next 10 years the population of the United States will increase many millions. The production of the country will likewise increase. Unless our railroad facilities are multiplied the transportation problem will become more serious than it has been in the past. I repeat, a policy must be pursued that will encourage capital investment in our transportation systems. There are now needed not hundreds of millions of dollars but several billions for betterments and improvements and for construction of additional railroad trackage. Hundreds of locomotives and thousands of cars are required. Better terminal facilities must be obtained.

Cooperation and integration among the railroad companies are imperatively required. The situation will become serious within a very short time unless capital is available for railroad development. Every reasonable effort should be made by railroad managers to satisfy the just demands of the people and to acquaint them with the obstacles which the railroads encounter and the difficulties which they have to meet, and the reasons, if reasons exist, why more favorable policies and lower rates may not be adopted and put into effect.

If the people can be convinced that the railroads are being operated efficiently and economically and that the interests of the people are being protected, then many of the attacks made upon the railroads will cease and the demand for governmental control and operation of the railroads will grow feebler. When the people believe that their interests are being ignored or betrayed and that they are the victims of wrongs at the hands of individuals or corporations or groups they will make demands which may be radical and perhaps unjust.

The way to prevent bad legislation and the enactment of measures which are socialistic and paternalistic is for those who are engaged in enterprises and activities of a quasi-public character to appreciate their true relation to the people and to adopt policies which are just and fair and can be defended in the forum of morals.

I venture to suggest that if those who own and operate our railroads want additional capital they must secure the confidence of the people. And I submit that with the growing demands for further transportation facilities it becomes a serious question where and how the needed capital is to be obtained. It is obvious that the applications made by the transcontinental lines to obtain permission to modify section 4 of the transportation act will arouse indignation throughout the intermountain region, as well as in other parts of our country. The people in the regions referred to will regard the railroads as enemies and feel that they are seeking to injure and to oppress them. I believe that the filing of these applications is not only imprudent and unwise but is unsound from an economic and business standpoint.

The granting of the applications would arouse a feeling of bitterness against the railroad companies among millions of people. It would result in decreasing the freight hauled to and from large sections of our country, and the losses thereby sustained could not possibly be compensated by any gains derived from the hauling of a larger tonnage from ocean to ocean or from the Chicago zone to the Pacific coast.

It is proper to remark that the Chicago district has been active in pushing these applications for the abrogation of some of the provisions of the fourth section of the transportation act. It is regrettable that there are sections of the country in which business interests urge the adoption of a selfish policy which must result in harm, if not disaster, to other parts of the land. There is no water competition, or, at least, it is unimportant, between the Chicago territory and the Pacific coast. Apparently the purpose is to meet competition of shippers on the eastern coast who send their products to the Pacific coast, and the plan, of course, is to compel the interior, and particularly the intermountain section, to supply funds from which the railroad companies may recoup their losses incurred in carrying out the plan of the Chicago district. It has been said that this is market competition and not carrier competition, and that when the railroads make market competition instead of carrier competition then the evil of a policy of this character becomes more apparent.

Railroads have no right to aid in market competition when it will result in discriminatory rates. The applications pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission are in aid of market competition rather than in aid of carrier competition. It is frequently said in reply to the appeals of the intermountain section for justice and relief that nature has given to coastal cities geographical advantages denied to the intermountain States, as well as to various interior points, and therefore no complaint should be made if lower rates are granted from coast to coast than from the coast to interior points, or from the latter to the coast.

It may be remarked that the Chicago territory is not as favorably situated geographically, in order to obtain the benefit of water rates, as are cities upon the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, but it is sought by an adjustment of rates which will give Chicago the same opportunity to ship to the Pacific coast as if it were located upon the Atlantic coast, and thus to remove the geographical disadvantage from which it suffers. The fact is that "Chicago seeks to sell upon the Pacific coast upon an equality with cities upon the Atlantic Coast, which ship by water; but it denies the intermountain region, which is situated 900 miles nearer Chicago than the Pacific coast, the right to rates by rail which will enable the intermountain jobbers to buy in Chicago upon an equality with San Francisco and Seattle."

At the expense of the intermountain region, it is designed to aid the Chicago district to obtain the same rates to the Pacific coast as to any intervening point. The scheme is to repeal, or at least to suspend, the provisions of the long-and-short-haul clause, and to force from the interior points millions of dollars in excess freight rates with which to recoup the losses which the railroads will undoubtedly sustain in carrying out this discriminating policy in favor of Chicago. As stated, it is demanded that the rates by rail to the coast shall be reduced notwithstanding the statutory long-and-short-haul rule, so that in selling upon the coast the adverse effects which might arise from the existence of the Panama Canal may be averted. This plan would permit the Pacific coast to buy upon the Atlantic coast with advantage of the longer haul, and then purchase in Chicago with discrimination against intermountain points along the railroad.

It is quite likely that it would be beneficial to the markets in Chicago territory, but it would be disastrous to the intermountain districts. It is sought, under these applications, to use the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend the law, thus increasing the disadvantages due to geographical location of all intermountain territory in order that the disadvantages, geographically, which Chicago has may be removed.

The injustice of such a plan is so patent as to need no argument. It seems to me to be shocking, and I can not believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission will give an affirmative reply to the request made.

Much may be said in support of the proposition that such a plan is illegal. As I read the statute, it requires that rates shall be "compensatory." I submit that the statute is not complied with by fixing rates for a long haul so low that recoupment must be made by increasing rates, or maintaining inordinately high rates, to and between intermediate points. A compensatory rate is not one which meets the costs of transportation. It was said in the case of Coleman Commercial Club v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. (33 I. C. C. Reports, p. 634) that—

> Competition between distributing markets does not constitute a justification for the maintenance of lower rates to a more distant than to an intermediate point.

Applying this decision to case made by the petitions now being considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission for further departures from the fourth section of the transportation act, it seems manifest to me that they should be promptly denied. To grant them, I submit, would be gross discrimination against shippers to intermediate points and manifestly unfair to the intermountain section of our country. In passing may I refer to the statement made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE]? As I understood him, his position was that there are no discriminations now with respect to the long-and-short-haul clause of section 4, that shipments from the East are required to pay the same rates to the coast as are shipments to intermediate points, and that shipments from the western coast, or from intermediate points to the East, are governed by the same rule. The Senator, I feel sure, is in error. The rates from the Pacific coast, for instance, to Chicago or New York are lower than are the rates from Salt Lake City or Denver or Reno to Chicago.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. The only change that has been made in the pre-war discriminations which existed under that section were those discriminations that were removed during the war on the ground that there were no ships left on the Pacific Ocean and therefore there was no excuse of competition. The same discriminations that were practiced before the war, moving east and moving throughout the rest of the country, are there now. That is the situation.

Mr. KING. That is as I understand it. The broad statement, therefore, of the Senator from Maryland needs qualification. The intermountain region is now discriminated against, and this injuriously affects this region in its efforts to find markets for its surplus products. It can not successfully compete in the Mississippi Valley and intermediate points with the Pacific coast and, of course, with the Chicago territory. Steel products manufactured in California or Oregon from pig iron produced in Utah may be shipped to Chicago or eastern markets at lower rates than are imposed upon similar products manufactured in Utah. Though 800 miles nearer Chicago than is San Francisco, Utah products are compelled to pay a much heavier rate than like products shipped from California. The Interstate Commerce Commission supports this policy, though it is ruinous to Utah and surrounding States.

Such a policy is economically unsound and it needs no argument to demonstrate its injustice and inequity. I submit that a transportation policy which permits such discrimination will disastrously affect many sections of our country, and the reactions upon our national, economic, and industrial life must, in the end, be exceedingly harmful. Moreover, I affirm that it is wrong to employ the power of the Government, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, to permit railroad companies to paralyze business in one section to improve industry in another, and to dry up the fountains of production and wealth at one point to open up springs of production in some other part of our country. Such a course is an abuse, indeed a perversion of the power committed to the Federal Government. That power has been used in the past, and it is against the continuation of this unfair practice that the legislation now before us is sought.

It is desired that section 4 of the transportation act shall be so amended as to make it impossible to continue abuses which have been so ruinous to the West and to other parts of our country. It is not sufficient argument to say that the railroads are compelled to meet competition between coast and coast because of the Panama Canal. I repeat the words of the decision just referred to that:

> Competition between distributing markets does not constitute a justification for the maintenance of lower rates to a more distant than to an intermediate point.

Notwithstanding this statement by the commission, the railroads are now asking for permission to give lower rates between terminal points than are fixed for intermediate points, though in so doing they would receive no compensation in many instances for carrying freight from coast to coast or from the Chicago district to the Pacific coast.

Mr. President, if the Panama Canal is to be used as a pretext to destroy interior sections of the United States, there will be some individuals who may feel that the more than $400,000,000 expended in its construction was not wisely spent.

In passing may I add that the Government has expended more than $174,000,000 upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries; more than a billion dollars have been expended by the Government upon its rivers and waterways. These vast sums were expended to aid commerce and to develop the industries of our country. Unfortunately much of these stupendous sums, in my opinion, have been wasted. A few years ago I made a careful examination of the items constituting these vast sums expended by the Government upon its rivers and inland waterways. I examined thousands of pages of reports and testimony, involving substantially every project, big and little, upon which money had been expended for the Government. I discovered that tens of millions of dollars had been wasted upon little streams and creeks and bayous and swamps. There had been a most profligate expenditure of the public funds. It is not to be wondered that there were criticisms of the "pork barrel" bills which were forced through Congress by "logrolling" and other unworthy methods.

Of course, such appropriations by Congress were illegal. They can not be defended from any standpoint. The reports revealed the strategy employed by various districts to obtain appropriations and the methods by which favorable consideration was given to unworthy projects.

Mr. President, the record of many of these appropriations is an ugly one. It is a reflection upon Congress, as well as upon the people in many parts of the country. There are many streams upon which millions were spent which never carried a pound of freight and never will. I recall that approximately eight millions of dollars were expended upon the Hennepin Canal in Illinois and I recall that a former Senator from Illinois, Mr. Sherman, admitted that the appropriation was improper and that the canal was of no advantage to commerce.

I have in mind scores of streams and districts which obtained many millions of dollars; the money was absolutely wasted and no freight is carried upon the stream. I am not opposed to a rational plan for the improvement of our harbors and inland waterways. I have heretofore condemned the wasteful, unscientific, and reprehensible policy which the Government has pursued in the past in dealing with its harbors and waterways. All attempts made to introduce a scientific and rational plan for the improvement of harbors and rivers failed.

Several years ago I offered a bill creating a suitable commission which should be charged with the duty of improving our harbors and waterways. This commission was to determine what expenditures were needed in order to provide for our commercial development and expend whatever Congress appropriated for rivers and harbors. I believe that a commission composed of technical, scientific, and business men should be charged with the responsibility of expending such sums as Congress might appropriate and allocating the sums to such harbors and rivers as they deemed for the best interests of the country.

The control of our harbors and waterways at present is some little improvement over the past, but we are still pursuing a wasteful and unscientific policy. Congress is still passing laws for the improvement of unworthy projects, and we are still appropriating for streams and rivulets which by the wildest stretch of imagination can not be brought within the principle which empowers Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

The fact is that the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution is being perverted and laws are passed based upon said clause, which I submit can not, in all fairness, be brought within the words and spirit of the Constitution. I recall that in the reports which I examined I learned that upon many streams work had been in progress for a great number of years. It seemed as if there was no purpose to complete the work but merely to furnish jobs for a large number of persons.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] referred a few moments ago to the appropriations which had been made for the improvement of the Ohio River. These appropriations have extended over a period, as I recall, of more than 30 years. A number of dams have been constructed, and three or four additional ones are required. The work has been carried on in a halting, hesitating, and wasteful manner. No advantages have thus far been derived, and millions of dollars have been taken from the Public Treasury. If the project was worthy of Federal consideration it ought to have been completed promptly.

It is a fact, however, Mr. President, that the railroads have, by their better service, made some of our inland streams of but little if any value as carriers of freight. Railroads have paralleled some rivers, and where this has been done, river traffic has ceased. The rates on railroad lines paralleling the Mississippi River are approximately 60 per cent of the average rates in the interior sections of our country. The railroads have, in some instances, in order to destroy water competition upon streams where the Government has expended millions for their development, established rates so low as to drive the boats from such waterways.

However, the rates fixed upon these lines were not applied in other sections. Doubtless in some instances the railroad companies derived no profit whatever from the operation of lines paralleling waterways. Freight rates in other parts of the country had to be maintained at higher levels in order to meet the losses resulting from the efforts to destroy water competition.

Much might be said upon the frightful waste, as well as the absurdity of a policy which takes millions out of the Treasury of the United States for the improvement of waterways and then permits the destruction of water transportation by permitting railroads paralleling the waterways to fix rates for that purpose.

Congress has done much to encourage the building up of our coastwise trade. Following the war, many American boats were put into this important service. The rates established by them, between intercoastal or from coast-to-coast points, were, generally speaking, reasonable, but the proposition is now presented of injuring, if not ruining, a portion of our coastwise trade, or at least that engaged in coast-to-coast traffic.

In the transcontinental cases of 1922, the Interstate Commerce Commission announced, as a criterion to be applied as construing the fourth section of the transportation act, that rate reductions proposing a departure from the fourth section must not threaten the elimination of legitimate water competition. It seems to me that this view is the correct one and that it should be adhered to by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Undoubtedly it expressed the will of Congress as that will was manifested in various legislative enactments.

I have heretofore referred to the importance of developing the internal trade and commerce of our country and adopting a sound policy which would call for the maintenance of our railroads at the highest point of efficiency. I also referred to the importance of encouraging the investment of capital in railroad enterprises, because of the imperative needs of railroad extensions and railroad development in many parts of the United States. The field of commerce is broad enough for two systems of transportation. Our railroads can not now adequately care for the demands of the people. Water transportation is needed, and a policy should be pursued which will make possible its development to meet the growing needs of the people. A destructive competitive policy, which would drive all boats engaged in coastwise trade from the seas and all boats and barges from our inland streams, must not be permitted; indeed, there must be encouragement for the development of our railroads and the expansion of our water-transportation systems.

On the 28th of February, this year, the Shipping Board, which is presumed to have some interest in the development of our merchant marine—although I confess its record is one of failure—protested, by resolution, against these applications of the railroads to set aside the provisions of section 4 and affirmed its belief that the plan contemplated in the applications would seriously injure our coastwise trade. I recall that an exhibit, which was offered by Mr. Garrow in the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce upon the applications to which I have referred, showed the total westbound tonnage through the Panama Canal in 1923 to be 3,277,225 tons. This was only 1.2 per cent of the westbound tonnage of the 13 transcontinental railroads. In other words, there were carried by boats from coast to coast through the Panama Canal 3,277,225 tons as against the enormous tonnage carried by the railroads, represented by 98.8, the base of calculation being 100.

The tonnage passing through the canal from coast to coast in the same year, exclusive of oil, amounted to 5,586,724 tons. The tonnage of the 13 roads increased from 226,800,000 tons to 271,600,000 tons, and for the year 1922 there was an increase in the tonnage of freight carried by these roads of 32,400,000 tons. These figures show the absurdity of claiming that there is any necessity for a modification of section 4 in order to meet water competition through the canal.

The railroads are scarcely able now to handle the vast tonnage which will be offered to them to be carried from ocean to ocean as well as from interior to various coastal points, and the rapidly increasing commerce of the United States will soon impose upon the railroads demands for additional facilities that they will be unable to meet. I repeat that a wise transportation policy calls for a general reduction in freight rates throughout the United States, not only from coastal points to interior points but from interior points to other interior points as well as to the coasts.

This is no time for the inauguration of further discriminatory policies. The farmers now are in distress, particularly because of the high freight rates and their inability to ship their surplus products to markets. I repeat that it would be most unwise, and certainly unjust, to abrogate the provisions of section 4 and permit the railroads to enter into a ruinous rate war with the boats which carry such a small fraction of our tonnage from coast to coast.

Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I briefly refer to legislation of Congress which was aimed at discriminatory rates. The railroads, by their rebates, discriminations, and evil practices, aroused the country to such an extent that Congress in 1887 was compelled to act. Some of the evils which the act of 1887 sought to correct were set forth in an article written by Judge McChord, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in 1918, a part of which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

The article is as follows:

MONUMENTS EVIDENCING RUINOUS EFFECTS OF LONG-AND-SHORT-HAUL RATES

Many of these factories proved to be failures, and a ride over the country to-day discloses crumbling buildings and smokestacks in many towns and villages as grim monuments to the dead hopes of their projectors. Not all of these were properly located; many of them were the result of the dreams of some inventor of a short cut to wealth, but most of them should have survived and would have done so except that influences were at work that made success impossible. Among the chief of these was the fact that the railroads favored certain manufacturing centers in the way of facilities and rates.

The freight-traffic manager's business was to secure tonnage for the particular railway by which he was employed. Long hauls in large lots afforded attractive business that added to the aggregate of the returns to the carrier from his efforts and led to his preferment by those higher up in the control and management of the road. Competition for business at points reached by several railroads was keen and incessant. The more railroads that served a particular point, the keener the struggle between rival traffic officials for business. For many years previous to 1910, and by many roads until 1906, rebates were paid to secure business to such an extent that officials have frankly admitted in evidence in proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission that few carriers pretended to collect more than 80 per cent of the advertised rates on shipments from competitive points. Railroads were built from business centers to business centers. Some reached the objective points by short direct routes and others by long indirect routes. The latter, in order to do business at the competitive point, met the rates named by the short line, meanwhile maintaining higher rates at shorter distance points on their own lines. In the same way competition by boats on our inland and coastwise waterways was met by all-rail carriers until transportation by water, so far as our inland rivers are concerned, has been nearly abandoned.

The inducement to give the large shipper and all shippers for manufacturing centers an adequate supply of cars, transit privileges, switching arrangements, etc., was ever present, and the force of competition operated in favor of such shippers.

These considerations rendered it impossible for the factory at the small town to compete in the sale of its products with a factory producing the same product at the larger and more favored city. The result was that the factory in the small town ceased to operate, and its employees were compelled to seek employment in the centers of production. * * *

Relatively the same facilities should be furnished the factory that ships 1 carload a day as the one that ships 10 or more carloads. The opportunity to do a manufacturing business at a profit should be afforded at any point in the country. The supply of raw material and the possible field of consumption will dictate the location. * * *

Mr. KING. The Interstate Commerce Commission in its second annual report commented upon the injustices resulting from the rate systen then in force. Its statement is as follows:

The sense of justice received a shock when one was told that the small dealer in the country town was made to pay three times as much for the carriage of his goods as the city merchant paid upon a like quantity for even a greater distance; and a well-founded feeling of discontent arises among many people when it can see things done under the protection of its law which seem to be plainly and unmistakably unjust. The advantages growing out of freight rates and discriminatory charges were referred to in the Sacramento-Santa Rosa case (29 I. C. C. 65)). The commission there said: "There can be no question about the great commercial advantages which accrue to the towns having these rates. In the contest for new factories, to the industries looking for locations on the Pacific coast, the town with these rates has an advantage which can not be overcome by its rivals not blessed with such rates. New factories mean more workers, more money, more houses, and more people in general. * * * The record of these cases shows that, although the fact that the railroads have published tariffs, eliminating San Jose, Santa Clara, and Marysville from the coast or terminal points has been known only a few months; already these three points have felt the disadvantage of the possibility of ultimately losing such rates. San Jose, for example, has been unable to secure new industries because of the absurdity of its terminal-rate position."

The situation became so intolerable that Congress determined to prevent the evils resulting from the discriminatory rates adopted by the railroads. The purpose was to prevent the charging of lower rates for longer hauls than for shorter hauls. Congress wrote into section 4 provisions which it was believed would terminate this great evil. Section 4, in part, is as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property under substantially similar circumstances and conditions for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction; the shorter being included in the longer distance. But this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great a compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property, and the commission may, from time to time, prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

This section, of course, must be construed in connection with other provisions of the act. Sections 1 and 3 of the act of 1887 sought to secure reasonable and nondiscriminatory rates. It was the contention of able lawyers and many shippers that a proper construction of sections 1, 3, and 4, and, of course, all must be construed together, prohibited such discriminations as would arise from granting lower rates for a long haul than for a short haul. Moreover, it is a principle of statutory construction that the evils sought to be remedied are to be taken into account in the construction of the remedial statute. Accordingly, as stated, it was believed by many that the act of 1887 prohibited, once and for all, the evils which resulted from granting lower rates over the same road and in the same direction, for a long than a short haul.

However, the commission and the courts took the view that the words—

under substantially similar circumstances and conditions—

permitted the railroads to depart from the provisions of section 4 which made it unlawful for a common carrier to charge or receive greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same lines in the same direction, the shorter being included in the longer distance, and to continue the evil practices which had aroused such universal opposition throughout the country. And they also made the railroads the judges for the purpose of determining, when departures from the fourth section were made, whether the conditions and circumstances were "substantially similar" to those which fixed the rates for other commodities to intermediate points.

Under the construction placed upon the act the discriminations resulting from charging lower rates for the long haul than for the short haul continued. The act was practically nullified by the construction placed upon it, and the people continued to be subject to the inequitable and discriminatory practices which they had revolted against and which they believed the act of 1887 would terminate. The provisions of the statute which provided that upon application to the commission it might—in special cases, after investigation, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property—were entirely disregarded, and without authorization the condemned practices against which the statute was leveled were continued.

The purpose of Congress in enacting the legislation referred to was to secure just and reasonable rates and to make unlawful every unjust and unreasonable charge; to prevent preferences between persons, localities, and commodities; to make undue or unreasonable prejudices or discriminations unlawful; to prevent discrimination in rates and charges and to make them unlawful; to make it unlawful to charge more for a short haul than for a long haul of persons or property; and to prevent pooling of freight of different railroads or dividing earnings of railroads. The purpose of Congress was manifest, but the construction placed upon the act left the people in many instances empty handed.

Under the construction placed upon the act the carriers applied indiscriminately higher rates for a short than for a long haul whenever it was of advantage to them. The shippers continued to charge to interior points in the intermountain States the maximum rate from the point of origin to the Pacific coast plus the rate from the Pacific coast to the point of destination. To illustrate, a merchant in Salt Lake City purchasing his goods in New York was compelled to pay the rate from New York to San Francisco with the added charge from San Francisco to Salt Lake City. And it should be stated that the rate from the coast to Utah and the intermountain region was exceedingly high. The merchants in Idaho who purchased goods in the same market were not charged the same rates, though the goods were shipped in the same car. And the merchandise destined for Idaho was unloaded in that State and the rest of the merchandise went on to Portland, 800 miles or more distant. The Idaho merchant was compelled to pay the rate to the Pacific coast plus the rate from Portland back to Idaho. This system, of course, imposed higher freight rates upon the interior sections. This policy was in violation of sections 1 and 3 of the act of 1887, and, as I contend, was not in harmony with the provisions of section 4.

It is obvious to the most superficial observer that this policy gave the Pacific coast an advantage and prevented the development of the intermountain region. The oppressive policy of the railroads became so intolerable that in 1910 Congress was compelled to respond to the demands of the people. The words of section 4—under substantially the same circumstances and conditions—were eliminated from the section, and the section was further amended so as to make it impossible for the carriers to charge—any greater compensation as a through route than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act.

A further proviso was added to the section reading as follows:

Provided further, That no rates or charges lawfully existing at the time of the passage of this amendatory act shall be required to be changed by reason of the provisions of this section prior to the expiration of six months after the passage of this act, nor in any case where application shall have been filed before the commission in accordance with the provisions of this section, until a determination of such application by the commission.

Whenever a carrier by railroad shall, in competition with a water route or routes, reduce the rates on the carriage of any species of freight to or from competitive points, it shall not be permitted to increase such rates unless after hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission it shall be found that such proposed increase rests upon changed conditions other than the elimination of water competition.

Undoubtedly it was felt by those who had suffered so long from the injustices and discriminatory practices of the railroads that these amendments to section 4 would bring relief, and it was believed that no modification of the long and short haul clause would be permitted by the commission, except upon proper showing and after a full and complete hearing.

The Interstate Commerce Commission on November 9, 1911, revoked former orders and restored the old system of rate making on combination rates to the coast with the back-haul rate to the point of destination. The Interstate Commerce Commission refused permission to the carriers to continue lower commodity rates from the Missouri River district and west to the Pacific coast than to intermediate points, but did authorize higher rates to intermediate points than to the coast on traffic originating in Chicago, Pittsburgh, and New York territories.

The rate from the Missouri River to the interior was fixed at not to exceed the rate to the coast. The rate from Chicago was fixed at 5 per cent, Pittsburgh 15 per cent, and New York 25 per cent higher to the interior than to the coast. This order was set aside by the Commerce Court, but in 1914 the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the action of the Commerce Court and affirmed the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Thereupon the carriers sought relief from the effect of the decision and the commission extended the time when the decree was to be made effective as to approximately 80 per cent of the westbound traffic until January 1, 1915. This action resulted in imposing millions of dollars of additional freight charges upon the people of this section.

Later, the commission, by decision, authorized the carriers to establish commodity rates from the Missouri River territory to the Pacific coast lower than to intermediate points—provided the rates from the Missouri River territory to the intermediate points were not exceeded by more than 15, 25, and 35 cents per hundred pounds from the points in Chicago, Pittsburgh, and New York territories, respectively. That is, the carriers might establish a rate to the Pacific coast from the Missouri River, the Chicago district, and New York; and a rate to the interior points at $1 from the Missouri River, $1.15 from Chicago, $1.25 from Pittsburgh, and $1.35 from New York.

Under this tariff the rates from New York to the Pacific coast on certain goods amounted to 85 cents, and to the interior, 1,000 miles shorter haul, $1.10. And in substantially all commodities this same inequality in tariff rates existe... This enabled the jobbers and merchants upon the coast to reship their products into the intermountain region and to compete with merchants and jobbers resident in that section.

The freight-rate situation continued unsatisfactory with constant applications for increase in rates and for discriminatory charges. It would tax the patience of the Senate if I should detail the devious ways of the carriers in evading the provisions of section 4, and in perpetuating the unjust and inequitable system of discriminatory rates which, with but slight modification, had prevailed for many years. It is sufficient to say that the law was practically nullified and the elimination of the words—in substantially similar circumstances and conditions—brought no benefits to the people or relieved them from the injustices to which they have long been subjected.

The situation was still unsatisfactory, and when the transportation act of 1920 was enacted demands came from various parts of the United States for relief from the oppressive and discriminatory rates which were still being enforced by many of the carriers.

Section 4, as amended by the act of February 28, 1920, makes it unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of a like kind of property, for a shorter haul than for a longer distance over the line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through route than the aggregate of the intermediate points subject to the provisions of this act. It also provides that upon application to the commission a common carrier—may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the commission to charge less for the longer than for the shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property * * * but in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from any more distant point if it is not reasonably compensatory for the service performed.

The provision is also made for a modification of section 4 where a circuitous rail line or route—thus increasing its mileage—is compelled to meet rail competition between and at the same terminal points. It was the intention of Congress, by this amendment to section 4, to terminate once and for all the evasions and injustices practiced by common carriers in exacting higher rates to intermediate points. It was felt that the railroads had treated contemptuously the long-and-short-haul provisions of the law and by tricks and devices wholly unworthy of them had imposed upon the people unconscionable rates to their great injury.

But events transpiring since the passage of the act indicate that Congress again failed in its purpose and that the railroad companies considered that they could still impose higher rates upon intermediate points and charge lower rates for the long haul.

The railroads are demanding the right, upon the pretext of meeting water competition, to nullify the long-and-short-haul provisions of section 4. They place a construction upon the words "reasonably compensatory for the service performed" at variance with the accepted meaning of the words and contrary to the interpretation placed upon them by the legislative branch of the Government. Because of the interpretation placed by the railroads upon section 4 as amended in 1920, and because of the uncertain attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to the construction of section 4, as amended, and particularly in view of the applications filed by 17 or 18 transcontinental railroads for permission to establish lower rates for longer hauls over rates applied to intermediate points, the intermountain section and other parts of the United States are demanding legislation which will make it impossible for the applications referred to to be granted.

The Senator from Nevada has offered as an amendment to H. R. 7877, known as the War Department appropriations bill, an amendment which deprives the Interstate Commerce Commission of the power to modify the long-and-short-haul features of section 4 in order that common carriers may meet water competition. Undoubtedly it would be more regular and more in conformity with the rules of the Senate to consider this question separate and apart from the appropriation bill now before us and solely upon its merits. But the lateness of the session and the numerous bills which have a privileged status make it impossible to secure consideration of this matter except as it shall be presented in the form of an amendment to an appropriation bill.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission had interpreted section 4 as Congress intended that it should be interpreted, then I have no doubt that the Senator from Nevada would not have offered his amendment. But when he sees the West and other sections of the country threatened with the revival of the discriminatory rates which have been so ruinous to the people, he feels, and other Senators feel, that the situation is so critical as to justify this rather unusual procedure.

Mr. President, there are those who believe that neither water competition nor any other form of competition warrants a policy permitting lower rates for a long than for a short haul. Hon. Johnston B. Campbell, one of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, has stated that—the fourth section fosters waste in transportation service, tends to reduce the revenue of carriers, and creates the very worst kind of discrimination ever devised by the mind of man. It takes away from the intermediate localities the benefit of their location with respect to the farther distant points. It favors the large centers and the large shippers as against the small centers and small shippers. It tends to make the large center larger and the small community smaller. It casts an additional burden on our economic questions. It tends toward congestion in the large communities, impoverishes the small community, and creates economic problems not only for this generation but for future generations to solve.

It seems clear that under the amendment of 1910, and certainly under the amendment of 1920, Congress intended to give vitality to section 4 and to prevent the evils which, Commissioner Campbell points out, arise from the construction which has been placed upon it.

The Supreme Court in the Intermountain Rate cases (234 U. S. 487) declared that—power in the carrier primarily to meet competitive conditions in any point of view by charging a less rate for a longer than for a shorter haul has ceased to exist, because to do so, in the absence of some authority, would not only be inimical to the provisions of the fourth section but would be in conflict with the preference and discrimination clauses of the second and third sections.

In other words, to meet competition is not sufficient ground to modify section 4 and thus impose discriminatory rates upon certain individuals or sections of the country. The 1910 amendment strengthened the act of 1887 and forbade any departures from the long-and-short-haul provisions, except that in "special cases and after investigation by the commission" modification might be made. But it is clear that competition was not a reason nor a "special case." Conceding that to meet water competition presents a "special case," the amendment of 1920 imposed a condition which must be met by the carrier before any modification of section 4 may be obtained.

The carrier must show, in order to obtain permission to charge less for a long than a short haul, that the charge made is "reasonably compensatory" for the service performed, and an investigation must be made by the commission and they must afterwards find that the charge made is "reasonably compensatory." The commission in determining this question must always keep in mind that whatever discretion they have must be a sound legal discretion—as to whether the request should be granted compatibly with a due consideration of the private and public interests concerned and in view of the preference and discrimination clauses of the second and third sections.

The public interest manifestly would not be served by adopting a policy which destroys water competition and ruins large centers of our country. Even without the amendment to section 4 in the transportation act of 1920, I am at a loss to understand the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It permitted violations of the fourth section by continuing the discriminations which were in force when the act of 1910 amending section 4 was enacted. Commissioner Campbell expressed his views upon this matter in the case of Palmine Co. v. I. C. R. R. Co. (87 I. C. C. 279), where he said:

By the 1910 amendment, therefore, the right and power to depart from the long-and-short-haul provision of the fourth section was taken from the carrier and lodged in the commission; and that amendment, so far as the carriers are concerned, made this provision of the fourth section absolute and unqualified, except in so far as it gives to the carrier the right to apply to the commission for authority to depart from that provision. This latter right to make application for such authority is specifically limited to "special cases," and such an application must embody facts which purport to present a "special case," or under the law it should not be considered as an appropriate application for authority to depart from this provision of the fourth section. The fourth-section violations brought about by the rates assailed in this case were not protected by such an application and should be held to be unlawful; and, following the reasoning in my dissenting expression in Anaconda Copper Mining Co. v. Director General (64 I. C. C. 136), since complainant paid freight charges on basis of such unlawful rates to the intermediate points, it is entitled to restitution in the amount of the difference between charges so paid and those which have been approved under the lower rate to the more distant point.

But conceding, for the sake of the argument, that under the provisions of section 4 as amended in 1910 departures from the fourth section were within the power of the commission to grant, a different question is presented in the light of the 1920 amendment.

It seems to me that much casuistry has been employed in explaining away the meaning of the words "reasonably compensatory." It must be borne in mind that Congress intended to prevent discrimination and to give vitality to the long-and-short-haul provisions of section 4. The special cases which might possibly warrant an exception to the rigid application of the rule must be brought within the rule that the rates charged must be "reasonably compensatory." In other words, Congress did not intend by the amendment of 1920 to permit a repetition of the wrongs resulting from violation of the long-and-short-haul clause.

The discussions in the Senate at that time indicate that it was the intention of Congress to prohibit the inequities and injustices visited upon certain sections or parts of our country in charging a less rate for a longer haul, and it was clear that the possibility of water competition was not a reason or a "special case" calling for modification of section 4. Indeed, it is declared in section 500 of the transportation act of 1920—

To be the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation, service, and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

Congress has shown its sincerity in promoting and fostering water transportation by appropriating more than a billion dollars to construct and repair harbors and to develop our inland waterways. Congress has appropriated more than $400,000,000 to construct the Panama Canal. Are these stupendous sums to be wasted and our water transportation to be destroyed? Manifestly Congress believed there was a broad field both for rail and water transportation.

Commissions had studied the transportation systems of Germany and reported that great benefits had been derived by the German people from the development of her rivers and harbors. The prosperity of Germany in part was due to the harmonious development of her dual transportation systems and to a proper coordination of the same.

At the last session of Congress approximately $40,000,000 were appropriated, as I now recall, to be expended upon our rivers and harbors. It is inconceivable that a policy should now be adopted that would drive boats and barges from our rivers and streams and paralyze the activities of our ships engaged in intercoastal or coastwise trade. And yet it is conceded that if the plans of certain railroads are carried into execution a large part of our coast-to-coast water traffic will be destroyed and all boats and barges driven from our inland streams. Even the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the transcontinental cases decided in October, 1922 (74 I. C. C. 48), stated:

It clearly would defeat the intent of Congress to foster transportation by rail and water in full vigor if the rail carriers were permitted at practically little or no profit to themselves to operate so as to deprive water carriers of traffic which the water carriers would naturally handle. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that where "out-of-pocket" theory is used as a rate basis there is inevitably thrown upon the rest of the traffic the task of providing the bulk of the net return contemplated in section 15 (a). Too wide an extension of the out-of-pocket theory would transpose the entire burden of meeting other fixed charges upon only a part of the traffic carried.

And in the case of a shipment of coffee from Galveston and other Gulf ports (64 I. C. C. 26) the commission stated, in granting relief from the fourth section, that it was necessary to consider not only the letter but the spirit of the law and the interests of the destination. However, these views can not quite be reconciled with the decision of the commission in the case above referred to (74 I. C. C. 71) where it is held that—

In the administration of the fourth section the words "reasonably compensatory" imply that a rate properly so described must (1) cover and more than cover the extra or additional expenses incurred in handling the traffic to which it applies; (2) be no lower than necessary to meet existing competition; (3) not be so low as to threaten the extinction of legitimate competition by water carriers; and (4) not impose an undue burden on other traffic or jeopardize the appropriate return on the value of carrier property generally, as contemplated in section 15 (a) of the act.

Commissioner Campbell concurred in the conclusions of the commission in denying certain of the applications but dissented from the construction placed upon section 4 as amended by the act of 1920, and stated:

To my mind "reasonably compensatory" as used in the amendment means a rate equal in amount to a "nonconfiscatory rate."

He then quotes from the opinion of Mr. Justice Brewer in the case of C. & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. 879, as follows:

Compensation implies three things: Payment of cost of service, interest on bonds, and then some dividend. Cost of service implies skilled labor, the best of appliances, keeping of the roadbed and the cars and machinery and other appliances in perfect order and repair. * * * The same rule obtains as to engines, machinery, roadbed, etc., and it may be doubted whether even the legislature, with all its power, is competent to relieve railroad companies whose means of transportation are attended with so much danger from the full performance of this obligation to the public. The fixed charges are the interest on the bonds. This must be paid, for otherwise foreclosure would follow and the interest of the mortgagor swept out of existence. The property of the stockholders can not be destroyed any more than the property of the bondholders. Each has a fixed and vested interest which can not be taken away.

When the act of 1920 was under discussion the words "reasonably compensatory" were considered. Senator CUMMINS in discussing the matter stated:

A compensatory rate, I assume, means a rate which will enable the railway company charging it to defray the cost of maintenance and operation and that will also bear its just share of the return upon capital. I take it that the word "compensatory" is used in that sense. Therefore, in the case put by the Senator from North Carolina, if the charge for the longer distance was not a compensatory charge the Interstate Commerce Commission would have no authority to grant the right to charge more for transporting the sugar, or whatever it may have been, over the shorter distance than it charged for transporting it over the longer distance. I think this amendment will go very far toward correcting the manifest abuses which have crept into the law. I think that the Interstate Commerce Commission could have prevented very many of those abuses by proper and correct rulings upon the law as it is, although I do not criticize it in that respect, for its work has been very difficult.

But, as I understand the decision of the commission in the Transcontinental cases, their definition of the words "reasonably compensatory" is much more restricted. A rate which would bring a return sufficient to more than meet the extra or additional expenses incurred in handling the traffic to which it applies would be "reasonably compensatory." How much more, they do not state; 1 cent or $1 might be more than sufficient to cover the extra additional expenses incurred in handling the traffic to which it applies. And yet it is obvious that that would not be "compensatory." How long would a business last if its returns were measured by the definition of the commission?

The statement of Senator CUMMINS contemplates that a rate which is "reasonably compensatory" must be such as will defray the cost of maintenance and operation of the railroad and will bear its just share of the return upon capital. One of the essentials of the compensatory rate is that there should be a reasonable return upon the capital invested. It is not a compensatory rate if the bare expenses of operation are met. If no returns were made upon investments, our industrial development would halt.

In the case of the Northern Pacific Railroad v. North Dakota (236 U. S. 585), the Supreme Court stated that—in determining the cost of the transportation of a particular commodity all the outlays which pertain to it must be considered. We find no basis for distinguishing in this respect between so-called "out-of-pocket" costs or "actual" expenses and other outlays which are none the less actually made because they are applicable to all traffic instead of being exclusively incurred in the traffic in question. Illustrations are found in outlays for maintenance of ways and structures, general expenses, and taxes. It is not a sufficient reason for excluding such or other expenses to say that they would still have been incurred had the particular commodity not been transported. That commodity has been transported, the common carrier is under a duty to carry, and the expenses of its business at a particular time are applicable to what it does carry.

Commissioner Campbell, in testifying before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, refers to the time when rail carriers violated the fourth section without check and in so doing destroyed water competition. He referred to the fact that they had driven water transportation from the ocean around the Horn, and by rail across the Isthmus of Panama. He further stated that, in his opinion, if the railroads were permitted to violate the fourth section to meet water competition, all boats would immediately reduce their rates and their decline would continue until destruction overtook them.

It would seem obvious that if a rate were "reasonably compensatory" for the services performed, any higher rate must be excessive, and if a given rate between Chicago or New York and San Francisco is "reasonably compensatory," then a higher relative rate, based upon mileage, to any intermediate point is excessive. I submit that any rate for a long haul, which is determined to be "reasonably compensatory," must be no greater than the aggregate of the intermediate rates.

If the provisions of the fourth section are broken down by the subtle casuistry which is employed in defense of the proposition that a rate is "reasonably compensatory" if it meets the out-of-pocket-plus standard, then there will be a recrudescence of the evils which obtained for so many years and brought such injury and distress to many parts of our country.

If water competition may be met by abrogating the fourth section, then the intermountain region and other States will be brought to economic and financial ruin. I am advised that the railroads proposed, if their applications are granted, to submit rates from the Chicago territory and other western points to the coast very much less than the present rates, and rates which manifestly will not be reasonably compensatory. But they will not change the rates to intermediate points, which means that those residing at such points must bear the additional burden resulting from the reduced rates upon the long haul. As an illustration, out of hundreds which might be given, I call attention to the proposed rates upon structural iron and steel from Chicago to Los Angeles.

As I understand, if the applications filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission are granted the rates upon these products from Chicago to Los Angeles will be $1 per hundredweight on a minimum carload lot of 100,000 pounds and $0.80 per hundredweight on a minimum carload lot of 80,000 pounds. This will be a reduction of 25 cents and 20 cents, respectively, over existing rates. But the rates between Chicago and New Mexico upon the same products will not be reduced, notwithstanding the fact that New Mexico is approximately 700 miles nearer Chicago than is Los Angeles. A 40,000-pound shipment of iron and steel from Chicago to New Mexico will cost $500, but if the same shipment is carried 735 miles farther the cost will be but $400.

It is apparent that such discrimination will injuriously affect New Mexico, and the same policy, of course, will be followed by all other transcontinental roads which are seeking the same ends, and the same serious consequences will visit the entire intermountain region.

Mr. President, the reason is apparent for the waging of this contest to secure the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada. Under the more equitable rate policy following the control of the railroads by the Government there has been some development in manufacturing and other industrial enterprises in Utah and in the entire intermountain region. The inhabitants of this section perceive, in the applications filed by the transcontinental railroads and in the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a danger and menace which brings to them terror and dismay. For more than a quarter of a century they contended against powerful odds. When the act of 1887 was passed they believed relief was at hand, but the evils from which they suffered were continued. The amendment to the fourth section enacted in 1910 it was confidently believed would terminate the evil practices which had brought them such harm. They regarded the provisions of the amendment to section 4 of the act of 1900 as a complete protection against discriminations and inequitable freight rates. And now after these years of battle and conflict they discover a new danger. It would be surprising if they did not avail themselves of every opportunity to secure protection against the enemy which is at their gates.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, before temporarily laying aside the bill, which I understand the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is going to request, and also before we take a recess or go into executive session, I desire on behalf of the committee to offer an amendment.

On page 79, line 14, under the title "Citizens' military training camps," I move to strike out in line 14 the figures "$2,100,000" and to insert "$2,330,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 79, line 14, it is proposed to strike out "$2,100,000" and insert "$2,330,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I want to say with reference to the proposed amendment to the appropriation bill, I have discussed the matter with the chairman of the committee and with the Senator from New York, and I have agreed to present the amendment to-morrow at 1 o'clock. At that time there will undoubtedly be a point of order made, and the question then will be on the point of order. I hope between 12 and 1, if I get an opportunity and the Senate will permit me to do so, to present my views with regard to the parliamentary situation affecting the presentation of this matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator, for one, that I am entirely willing that the procedure outlined by him shall be followed; and, for that matter, I am willing that the amendment be officially and formally offered now, and no point of order will be raised against it before 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. PITTMAN. That course is probably better. Then it can be printed in the RECORD.

For that purpose, Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The READING CLERK. On page 96, after line 6, insert:

That paragraph (1) of section 4 of the interstate commerce act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(1) That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act, but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, That upon application to the commission a common carrier may, after public hearing, be authorized by the commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property only in a case where the route via the applicant carrier or carriers is longer than via the route of some rail carrier or rail carriers between the same points; but in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from the more distant point that is not reasonably compensatory for the service performed; and if a circuitous rail line or route is granted authority to meet the charges of a more direct rail line or rail route to or from competitive points and to maintain higher charges to or from intermediate points on its line, the authority shall not include intermediate points as to which the haul of the petitioning line or route is not longer than that of the direct line or route between competitive points: Provided further, That the commission may, with or without hearing, upon its own motion or upon application of carrier or shippers, in cases of emergency, such as drought or disaster, authorize during the continuance of said emergency any common carrier or carriers to charge or receive a greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance.

"Where any common carrier has, or common carrier have, in effect any rate, fare, or charge which is less for the longer than for the shorter distance between two points (the shorter being included within the longer distance), and which has been authorized by the commission or as to which application was filed with the commission on or before February 17, 1911, and not yet acted upon by it, such rate, fare, or charge shall not become unlawful (except by order of the commission) until after 12 months following the passage of this amendatory act; nor shall such rate, fare, or charge in effect via circuitous rail carrier or rail carriers become unlawful if it shall have been authorized by order of the commission, after public hearings, based on no less a showing than that upon which the commission is herein authorized to grant relief: Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall prevent the commission from authorizing or approving departures from the provisions of this section in so far as applicable to import or export rates, including rates applicable to traffic coming from or destined to a possession or dependency of the United States, or to a block system of express rates established by order or with the approval of the commission, or permitted by it to be filed."

Paragraph 2 of section 4 of the interstate commerce act, as amended, is hereby repealed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, so that we may all understand it, I will state the intention is that at the conclusion of business this afternoon the Senate will stand in recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that at 12 o'clock general debate will cease, and that at 1 o'clock, if the Senator from New York may obtain recognition—which I hope he will be permitted to do, in the spirit of this agreement—the point of order will be raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator submit that request?

Mr. PITTMAN. As far as the Senator from Nevada is concerned, if he has the floor, he will yield for that purpose; and, as I stated before, I hope to present my views of the parliamentary situation in justification of my offering this amendment. Of course there may be other Senators who will want to speak.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think we all understand each other, and there probably will be no serious difficulty about it.

Mr. GOODING. That is my understanding, Mr. President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am very grateful to both Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator submit that as a request?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think it is necessary for a unanimous-consent agreement to be entered into. The amendment is here, subject to a point of order. If the point of order should be made, I am perfectly willing to trust the matter to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps it can be done in this way: I may give notice that at 1 o'clock to-morrow, or as near that time as may be, I shall make the point of order.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I said, when I presented the amendment I did so with entire confidence in the Senator from New York. I do not require any agreement.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8350) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 to the bill H. R. 8350; receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and concurred therein with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 21, 22, and 23; agreed to a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SHREVE, Mr. TINKHAM, and Mr. OLIVER of Alabama were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

LEASING OF UNALLOTTED INDIAN LANDS

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, last evening the Senate passed Senate bill 2314. It has reference to giving power to the Secretary of the Interior to make leases of unallotted Indian lands, instead of for 10 years, as under the present law, for 10 years and as long thereafter as oil or gas is found in paying quantities. Inadvertently we overlooked the fact that there is before the Senate a similar bill which has already been passed by the House and has already been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs.

Under the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the House bill, which is on the calendar as Order of Business 580, with a favorable report from the Indian Affairs Committee, be considered at this time; and if it is passed, I shall move to reconsider the action of the Senate by which Senate bill 2314 was passed yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma for the temporary laying aside of the unfinished business and the present consideration of this House bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, just one question, please. Was there any opposition to this bill in the committee?

Mr. HARRELD. No. This proceeding is merely to correct an error that was made last night. We should have substituted the House bill for the Senate bill and passed the House bill; but the fact that the House bill was on the calendar and was before the Senate with a favorable report was overlooked at the time. I make the request simply to remove the necessity of having to pass the Senate bill in the House. We have met half way between the two places. It is just to correct a parliamentary tangle.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator's request carries with it a request that the bill now pending shall be only temporarily laid aside for this purpose?

Mr. HARRELD. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, then, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Oklahoma?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6298) to authorize the leasing for oil and gas mining purposes of unallotted lands on Indian reservations affected by the proviso to section 3 of the act of February 28, 1891.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRELD. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the votes by which Senate bill 2314 was ordered to a third reading and passed, and that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to reconsider the votes by which Senate bill 2314 was passed and that it be indefinitely postponed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

EMPLOYEES OF THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate may take up House bill 8262, to fix the compensation of officers and employees of the legislative branch of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8262) to fix the compensation of officers and employees of the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as there is hardly time to consider the measure to its end to-night I ask unanimous consent to lay it aside for the purpose of taking up some executive business which will follow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think under the form of the request this particular bill would be the unfinished business to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. I hardly think so after the agreement is made to take up the appropriation bill at a special hour. However, I am perfectly willing to submit to the chairman in charge of the bill to-morrow if he will lay aside his bill that I may call up this bill. As I understand the arrangement made, the appropriation bill will be taken up at 1 o'clock.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At 12 o'clock. The Senator from Nevada desires to discuss the War Department appropriation bill at 12 o'clock, and at 1 o'clock I am to raise the point of order on his amendment. I had hoped that we could pass this bill to-night.

Mr. WARREN. Unfortunately, in the absence of one or two who want to be heard on House bill 8262, it is likely to take a longer time than we have to-night. I am perfectly willing to have it considered now and passed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, if some time is to be taken up in the consideration of the bill called up by the Senator from Wyoming, we would have to alter the arrangement about the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. May I make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming? Is the bill which he seeks now to have passed the one that eliminates the bonus and gives the employees a 5 per cent increase?

Mr. WARREN. It gives various increases. It gives the senior clerks to Senators a minimum of something more than 20 per cent over the bonus and their old salaries. It gives House Members $4,000 each for two clerks, which is an increase of only 10 per cent over their present allowances. It gives the other employees the bonus and somewhere from 8 to 10 per cent over the salaries and bonuses they were receiving.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What request does the Senator make?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from New York has a right to ask that, having taken this bill up now, we put it on its passage.

Mr. WILLIS. I trust that will not be done. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who has taken a great deal of interest in this matter, is not present. I will say that there would be at least some discussion. If it is desired to run on for a time, I do not object to that, but I should have to call for a quorum, because I would not like to have the bill disposed of unless the Senator from New Hampshire were present.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to tangle up matters at all, and I am willing to withdraw my request.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to have the Senator from Wyoming thoroughly understand my own predicament.

Mr. WARREN. I understand it perfectly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have just reached an arrangement under which at 1 o'clock to-morrow a certain point of order will be raised on an amendment which has already been offered to the War Department appropriation bill. So, of course, the War Department bill must be before the Senate when that point of order is raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming withdraws the request he made.

Mr. WARREN. I withdraw it altogether. I acted only with a desire to push the matter along.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I want to make a brief statement about this matter. So far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest objection to the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. WARREN. Before the Senator starts, permit me to say that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] asked me two days ago not to call the bill up and finish it on Thursday, but that he would be here on Friday, and he wished to offer an amendment, which I told him I would certainly oppose, and he made no further request. It is a question whether he should be present when we call the bill up or whether he should not be. He knew I would call it up at the first opportunity. That is the situation.

Mr. WILLIS. No one, of course, questions in the slightest degree the good faith of the Senator——

Mr. WARREN. I simply withdraw my request altogether.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIS. I want, if I may, to finish my statement. Of course, no one questions the good faith of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming. I simply know that there are a number of Senators who are interested in this measure and who have expressed a desire to be present, and I know that one or two desire to offer amendments to the bill. I therefore think it proper to call attention to that situation and to say that if the bill is to be taken up at this time, in fairness to those Senators I shall have to call for a quorum.

LA PLATA RIVER COMPACT

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. BURSUM. From that committee I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1656) granting the consent and approval of Congress to the La Plata River compact, and I submit a report (No. 554) thereon.

This is a bill ratifying a compact between New Mexico and Colorado relating to the apportionment of the waters of the La Plata. No other State has any interest whatever in the bill. The Senator from Colorado is here, and I ask that the bill be now considered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think we ought to put any bill on its passage this afternoon; it is too late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall object to any bill going through this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill goes to the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 7962. An act to extend for the period of one year the provisions of Title II of the food control and District of Columbia rents act, approved October 22, 1919, as amended; and

H. R. 7895. An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes.

RECESS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, what is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood there was to be a motion for an executive session.

Mr. LODGE. I promised one or two Senators that I would not call for an executive session to-day.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate stand in recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 17, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, May 16, 1924

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, Thou art merciful and gracious and slow to anger, and Thy truth endureth from generation to generation. Do Thou, gracious Lord, incline our hearts to seek Thy face and to own Thee as Father and Savior. Into the secret places of every breast, let Thy whisper come and bless us with Thy peace. Let Thy blessing rest upon our homes. The loved ones of our firesides, wherever they may be, O may they ever be kept dear and near to the heart of our heavenly Father. May we have the faith that gives hope in the darkness, strength in weakness, courage in perplexity. Bear with our infirmities and fortify us against error. Deliver us from the anxiety of the future and make us strong, urgent men of to-day, through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 4445. An act to amend section 115 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2169) to amend in certain particulars the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, and for other purposes, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. CAMERON, and Mr. FLETCHER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7995) to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendments bills of the following titles:

AMENDING NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2169), to insist on the House amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the conference report on a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2169. An act to amend in certain particulars the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McKENZIE, Mr. HULL of Iowa, and Mr. QUIN.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 5078, the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47 to the bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

REED SMOOT,
CHARLES CURTIS,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
FRANK MURPHY,
CHARLES D. CARTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 47. Mr. Speaker, in support of my motion I desire to make this statement of the situation with reference to the Interior Department appropriation bill: That bill, as you know, covers the appropriations for all activities of the Interior Department. It is a bill of very great importance. It carries a number of items which are immediately available. That bill passed the Senate on February 28. Since then it has been in conference. It is now in May and the delay very largely has been caused by inability of the two bodies to agree with reference to the item providing for purchase of the Bright Angel Trail in the Grand Canyon. I received a telegram the other day that the Boxer, a ship used by the board of education for its work in Alaskan waters, has been laid up. The captain and engineer are laid off because there is no money with which to pay them, although this bill carries money for that purpose.

There are other activities that are suffering likewise by reason of this delay of this bill to become a law. It is strange indeed that the bill should be delayed because of this one item, which at first blush might appear to be of small consequence. It involves an appropriation proposed by the House for the purchase of the trail leading from the rim down to the floor of the canyon in the Grand Canyon National Park from the county of Coconino. The opposition to that is led in another body by a gentleman who has a very close personal interest in that matter. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 4001, March 11, 1924, will be found a letter from one Ralph H. Cameron to the Senate conferees on this bill under date of March 5, which says:

It has been stated that I have an interest in certain mining claims within the Grand Canyon National Park, which have been the subject of litigation. I reiterate that I have not at the present time, and have not had for many years prior to the date of the creation of the Grand Canyon National Park in 1919, any interest in claims title to which is being litigated by the Government of the United States. It has also been stated that the water from two springs on the Bright Angel Trail have been polluted with typhoid germs. Title to one of these springs is in the county of Coconino, Ariz.; the other in a mining location in which I have had no interest for many years.

I can not say who is the Ralph H. Cameron who signed that letter. I have a letter from the Attorney General of the United States in response to a recent inquiry on my part. I will say that the mineral claims that are cluttering up the development of the Grand Canyon and make possible the continuance of serious nuisances in the park, the question of validity of those claims of Ralph H. Cameron was passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1920, which held them to be invalid. It is apparent, if you had no knowledge of the facts, you would understand that nothing but high influence of some description could hold possession of United States property in a great national park for four years in the face of a decision of the United States Supreme Court.

Ralph Cameron writes the Senate conferees he has no interests in claims in litigation. Under date of May 6, 1924, Attorney General Stone wrote me as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 6, 1924.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CRAMTON: I am in receipt of your letter of the 2d instant regarding the pending cases involving Ralph H. Cameron, which affect lands within the Grand Canyon National Park.

Upon receipt of the letter dated February 28, 1924, from the Secretary of the Interior, to which you make reference, I instructed the United States attorney at Tucson, Ariz., to take appropriate action to enforce full and complete compliance by Mr. Cameron with the decrees which had been entered in the suits brought to enjoin occupancy of these lands by him and others. In my letter, which was dated March 5, 1924, I referred to the fact that the controversy regarding occupancy of lands under mining claims in that area was of long standing and should be terminated as speedily as possible, and that I desired him to give the matter immediate attention.

I may say that the letter of the Secretary brought to my attention not only the failure of Mr. Cameron and his associates to fully comply with the decrees in the cases referred to, but also the claims asserted by eight individuals said to be associates of Mr. Cameron under about 55 placer mining locations of 160 acres each on the floor of the Grand Canyon. As to these, the United States attorney was directed to institute appropriate suit or suits.

Prompt acknowledgment of my letter of instructions was made by the United States attorney. The institution of proceedings has been somewhat delayed by reason of the fact that he was engaged in important court work and for the further reason that some investigation was necessary, as was also the procuring of certain data from the local land office in Arizona. I have, however, received a report dated the 5th instant, in which the United States attorney states that motion and affidavit in contempt proceedings for violation of the injunction were that day forwarded to Phoenix for filing, and that a bill for injunction against locators of the claims on the floor of the canyon will be completed and forwarded to the superintendent of the Grand Canyon National Park for verification not later than to-day.

I have had close supervision kept of this matter, and assure you that no unnecessary delay will be tolerated.

Respectfully,

HARLAN F. STONE, Attorney General.

So that this letter makes it apparent that one Ralph Cameron is to-day and has been for years in litigation with the United States concerning mineral claims in the Grand Canyon National Park. Whether this Ralph Cameron who wrote the conferees is the one or not, some Ralph Cameron is party to a litigation now being carried on by the Attorney General of the United States. At the same time I have a report from the superintendent of this national park dated May 1, 1924, referring to a Mr. Steel who is in charge of Indian Gardens in the park, and who takes his orders from some Ralph H. Cameron, which says in part:

Warm weather will be here soon, and I sincerely trust that during the heated period visitors to Grand Canyon National Park may be permitted to rest and eat lunch in the splendid grove of cottonwood trees, where pure water is abundant.

Mr. Steel, the hard-boiled caretaker, is not at Indian Gardens at present, but I understand he is away on a short vacation. In his place there is a rather likeable young man, who yesterday, at least, appeared to be very courteous. It is obvious, however, that he is carrying out the instructions of Mr. Steel, for when we arrived at Indian Gardens from Phantom Ranch two hikers were resting on the benches at the lunch station, where the water has been found to be dangerous, and where we posted the signs that have been torn down.

I might say that the water at the place where tourists stop for lunch has been found to contain thousands of colonies of typhoid bacilli. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] and the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and myself drank quantities of that water, and I do not know how we got by the typhoid germs, but we did.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Would the gentleman be kind enough to locate this person Steel and this person Cameron, of whom he speaks, and tell us with just what department of the Government he is still connected officially?

Mr. CRAMTON. Steel is an employee of one Ralph Cameron and has charge of this ideal camping spot in the national park that is withheld from public use by Ralph Cameron, who holds possession without legal right. Ralph H. Cameron I am not able to identify. There seems to be difficulty, for the reason that one Ralph H. Cameron wrote a letter to the conferees in which he said that he had no interest in the control of these springs or any mineral claims, but the Ralph H. Cameron that is the employer of Mr. Steel exercises to-day that control, and under his authority the signs which the administration of the park put up to warn the public against drinking that typhoid water were torn down, probably by Mr. Steel.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. You say you can not identify Mr. Cameron. What you mean to say is that you will not identify him? Is not that it?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am seriously handicapped by the parliamentary rules in the presentation of the matter, reference to Members of another body being forbidden.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. That is entirely sufficient.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Eakin in his letter states further, referring to the two hikers who were sitting there:

I asked them if they had drunk any of that water, and they replied that the man above had told them that the water at the house was unsafe, but that the water at the lunch station was safe—

That is, where it contained the typhoid bacilli. Then he proceeds:

In other words, they were deliberately misled and deliberately directed to water that is impure. This, I believe, shows you the necessity of obviating any delay possible in securing Government control at Indian Gardens.

I have a few pictures here that you can not very well see at a distance, but anyone interested in them can look at them more closely and see the disgraceful sort of shacks and wrecks that strew this most beautiful part of the trail leading down into the canyon. Visitors to the park wonder how the Government of the United States permits those things to be there. But they are on the land held by Ralph Cameron in defiance of law. I myself wonder why, after four years, with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring the invalidity of his claims, Cameron still holds possession, but he does. The present Secretary of the Interior and Attorney General now have proceedings under way to put him out.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] and myself visited the place a year ago and we came to the conclusion that we would stop this thing, and that the Government should maintain its control over the property, no matter how high the official position or connection of the squatters might be. To fully clear up the situation it is essential the Government acquire title to this privately owned trail in the park, which is a toll trail.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The House, by an overwhelming vote, backed up the gentleman in his position. I do not know anything that has transpired since that would warrant the House in receding from that position.

Mr. CRAMTON. I hope the House will not recede, but will make its position more apparent. We have again been in conference, and we can not agree.

Mr. BLANTON. There was not a single dissenting vote before.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is amazing to me that any private individual, whether in office or not, should maintain the attitude that some Ralph Cameron does maintain toward this wonderful park—a national playground. It is so contrary to the attitude of others.

The announcement of a gift of $250,000 for the purpose of constructing and maintaining museums in the national parks was made this week by the American Association of Museums which has been holding its annual conference here in Washington. The Congress has made possible the acceptance of such public-spirited benefactions by giving the Secretary of the Interior the necessary legislative authority to accept donations for national-park purposes.

With this splendid contribution park museums which will tell the story only of the parks are to be built in Yellowstone and Yosemite National Parks, and adequate funds are to be provided for their maintenance over a period of several years. In Mesa Verde Park, in southwestern Colorado, which I visited last summer, I saw the walls of a building, harmonious with its surroundings, rising under the almost loving touch of the superintendent, which is to house the relics of a prehistoric civilization which built the wonderful ruins that are preserved in this park. The funds for this building were subscribed by a park visitor, who felt the small inadequate timber structure which the Government of the United States had given funds to build was a disgrace, and out of her own means she has supplied funds for the proper housing of these invaluable relics.

These museums are supplying the demand of thousands of visitors who pour into these parks for information on the natural sciences. Specimens of the beautiful but unknown flowers growing by the wayside are to be placed in these museums, properly labeled so that the visitor may identify them in the field. The rocks and trees, and in fact all the living and growing things can thus be made known by the museums and the early historical records kept there. These museums are fountains of education, and by giving a better knowledge of our land create a stronger love for it. These invaluable adjuncts to the wonderful service that is being rendered in these national parks are being given by public-spirited citizens without a cent of cost to the Federal Government.

That is the spirit that is aroused in the normal American who comes in contact with these great playgrounds and scenic reservations. That spirit is commendable, the desire to serve the common good by private means and private effort.

In comparison, how pitiable is the exhibition of the desire to hinder the public use or to monopolize and exploit for private gain these wonder spots of the earth.

I am not going to take longer time. I am going to ask a roll call on this, because I want another body to understand that this House has determined that this intolerable situation in a great national park shall not continue, and that no amount of personal influence shall be permitted to stand in the way of the public good.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a moment first?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Will the gentleman be good enough to tell the House if this bill is being held up on any other items than this Bright Angel Trail item?

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill has been completed for two months as to everything else in the bill except this one item.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 353, nays 1, not voting 79, as follows:

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not like to object to any man addressing the House; but if Members could realize the pressure that is brought upon the Rules Committee to get legislation before the House, they would appreciate the position I am in at this time. The Rules Committee is willing to bring out rules as fast as the House can absorb them, and that is the best we can do. If we are going to get this legislation through, we can not yield for speeches outside of the regular order of business. I will not object now, but I do feel that in the future I shall be obliged to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, while listening to the President's veto message yesterday I had some very strange and ironic thoughts. I was wondering whether the President fully realized what the service men of the Nation did in the war not only to keep safe our beloved country from foreign aggression but to protect the property of the taxpayers in whose welfare the President seemed so intensely interested.

Now, knowing from past experience that this veto was what to expect, I saved a little clipping which was written by "Old Timer" in the Chicago Tribune after the late lamented President Harding had sent his veto message to Congress. I saved this clipping, knowing that the day would come when this adjusted compensation bill would be again vetoed, and I am going to offer it for the deep consideration of this House:

I remember the dawn of that cold rainy day
Our first time over the top,
How for hours we crouched in the mud of the trench
With our hearts going flippity-flop.
And at last the word came—and over we went,
Where the bullets whistled and spat;
And shrapnel screamed 'round like devils from hell,
But—nobody vetoed that.

I remember a night in a thick marshy wood,
When the boche gave a chlorine-gas ball;
We couldn't fight back, we were held in reserve,
Had to stay there and take it—that's all.
And thicker and thicker the stinking fumes grew
While we lay there sprawling out flat,
Choking and cursing—but—holding our ground;
And nobody vetoed that.

I remember the nights, when with pick and spade,
We scooped shallow graves for our dead;
No songs could be sung—there were snipers around,
Not even a prayer could be said.
We had to work fast for with coming of day
The guns would start in to chat;
Without coffins or blankets we laid them away—
And nobody vetoed that.

Now, my colleagues, I confidently hope that the membership of the House of Representatives when we vote to-morrow will rebuke the President for the gratuitous insult which he gave, in his message yesterday, to the men who bore arms for this Republic, and by an overwhelming vote will pass this adjusted compensation bill, and thus render belated justice to the service men of the United States. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with the conference report on the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in connection with the conference report on the Interior Department appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on H. R. 8350, making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read instead of the report.
